De. 33:27. He. 1:3. The Heb. word Jehovah is very frequently tr. by the English word Lord, which in our Bible is always printed in small capitals for the sake of distinction; also sometimes when the original word is not Jehovah, as in that very remarkable passage, Ps. 110:1. where the original is Adonai. This word is also applied to kings, Ge. 40:1. princes and nobles, Ge.

MAN, s. Man was in his original state a very noble and exalted creature, being placed as the head and lord of this world, having all the creatures in subjection to him. The powers and operation of his mind were extensive, capacious, and perfect; capable of contemplating on the works of God with infinite pleasure and delight, and of performing his will without the least deviation. But by sinning against his Creator, his mind is vitiated, corrupted, and debased;
and he is in a ruined, lost, miserable, and wretched state. Hence it is asked, What is man? Ps. 8:4. The Heb. word for man is Enosh, i. e. sorry, wretched, and incurably sick; to denote his condition, in his apostasy from God. Man is called Ish, Ps. 4:3. || 49:2.
i. e. noble, dignified, and valiant; and Adam,
which signifies earthy, and is put for the baser sort of people, Ps. 49:2. Is. 2:9.

MANDRAKES, s. are distinguished into male and female. 1 They are of a strong narcotic quality, and mentioned in some ancient writers as convenient to be given before an amputation, to lessen the sense of pain, by stupefying the patient; but modern practice does not use them for such use. 2 They are reckoned cooling, and recommended in inflammations of the eyes. The mandrakes which Rachel desired, are by some called violets, by others lilies or jessamine, by others citrons, &c."

MERCY-Seat. a. || or Propitiary, was the covering of the ark, in which the tables of the law were deposited. This cover was of gold, and at its ends were fixed the two cherubims of the same metal, which, by their wings extending forward, seemed to form a throne for the majesty of God. Ps. 80:1. and the ark was as it were his footstool. It was an eminent type of Christ, who, by his atonement, covered our sins, and bore the curse for us; standing between God and the curse of the law for our sakes, that God might look on the law through Christ, as fulfilled by him on our behalf. Ro. 3:25.

MOURNING signifies, (1) Godly sorrow for sin, Mat. 5:4. (2) Moderate sorrows under afflictions, Ge. 22:2. (3) Gracious lamentation, Mat. 24:30.
The Hebrews, in mourning for their dead, wept, tore their cloths, smote their breasts, fasted, lay on the ground, and went barefoot. The time of mourning was commonly 7 days: and sometimes longer or shorter, as circumstances differed. They used to hire mourners, Jer. 9:17. But the high-priest was to use no signs of mourning: being herein a type of Christ, and his saints in heaven. Lu. 21:10, 11, 12.

MYSTERY, s. A secret, a thing hid, or beyond comprehension. A mystery is not a thing contrary to reason, nor utterly unknown as to its being; but a matter of which we have clear evidence as to its existence, yet the nature or mode of it is incomprehensible. In this sense all the doctrines of the gospel are mysteries, because there are inexplicable depths in them, Ep. 1:9.

OFFERING, see The Hebrews had several kinds of offerings, which they presented at the tabernacle and temple. Some were free-will-offerings, as the peace-offerings, vows, offerings of wine, oil, bread, and other things, made to the ministers of the Lord for devotion. Others were of obligation, as the first-fruits, tithes, and sin-offerings. All offerings in general they called Corbans: But the offerings of bread, salt, fruits, and liquors, as wine and oil, which were presented to the temple, they called Minchas.
The Hebrews had properly but 3 sorts of sacrifices, (1) The burnt-offering, which was wholly consumed, only the priest had the skin, Le. 7:8.
(2) The sacrifice for sin, or expiation for him
who had fallen into any offence against the law,
Le. 4. (3) The peace-offering, which was offered voluntarily in praise to God, or to ask favours, see the breast and right shoulder of which belonged to the priest, Le. 7:31, 34.

 OLYMPUS. s. Ro. 7:6. not in o. of the letter
 OLIVE, s. is a tree full of fairness, and yields plenty of oil. There are two kinds. The cultivated olive-tree is of a moderate height, its trunk knotty, its bark smooth, and of an ash color; its wood is solid and yellowish, the leaves are oblong, and almost like those of the willow, of a green under, dark on the upper side, and white on the under. In June it puts forth white flowers, in bunches. The fruit is oblong and plump. The wild olive is smaller in all its parts. CRUEN.

PALM-Tree, s. is an upright, tall, fruit-bearing, flourishing, and shadowy tree, Pa. 92:19.
Song 7:7, 8. Jer. 10:5. *It grows by the sweet springs of water, and continues long. It will not be pressed or bound downward, or grow crooked, though heavy weights be laid on it.
This tree is one of the most famous of all the forest, and is the usual emblem of constancy, fruitfulness, patience, and victory; which the more it is oppressed, the more it flourishes; the higher it grows, the stronger and broader it is in the top. One kind is the date-tree. The Hebrews called it 'Thamar, and the Greeks, Phoenix. The finest and best palm-trees were about Jericho, En-gedi, and along the banks of Jordan. Palm-trees from the same root produce*

PRAYER, s. Is. 40 offering up of our desires to God for things lawful and needful, with an humble confidence to obtain them through the divine mediation of Christ, to the glory of God,
 Mat. 6:5. | 16:23,24,26. It is either mutual or vocal, ejaculatory or occasional, private or public, 1 Ti. 2:12. We must pray constantly,
 Col. 4:2. fervently, Col. 4:12. sincerely, Ps. 17:
 1. with faith, Ja. 5:15. and repentance, Ps. 66:
 18. Jer. 36:7. and by the help of the Holy Spirit, Ro. 8:26.
 Prayer comes from a Hebrew word, signifying appeal, interpellation, intercession; whereby we offer our own cause, and that of others, to God.
 The parts of Prayer are said to be invocation, adoration, confession, petition, pleading, dedication, thanksgiving, and blessing.

Ro. 8:29, 30. where it is applied to God's fore-ordinating those whom he foreknew, i. e., with approbation, namely of the Gentiles, as well as the Jews, to be conformable to the image of his Son, both in holiness and glory. So, Ep. 1:5. providens, having fore-appointed us, i. e. Believers in general, to the adoption of sons. But in v. 11. it relates particularly to the Jewish converts, who electi etiam providens, were taken, as it were, by lot, being before appointed, according to God's purpose of uniting under Christ, all things, both which are in heaven and earth, i. e. angels and men, Jews and Gentiles. Comp. v. 9. and 10.

In 1 Co. 9:7. it refers to the gospel-plan of saving mankind, particularly the Gentiles, (see Ro. 16: 25, 26. Ep. 3:5, 8, 9.) which was ordained before the world began; see 2 Ti. 1:9. 1 P. 1:20. The above cited are all the passages of the N. T. wherein the verb occurs. 'The word predestinate is taken for the design that God has been pleased to have from all eternity of bringing, by his free grace, to faith and eternal salvation, some certain persons, whom he loved in Christ; whilst he leaves others to continue in their iniquity, or in their corruptions. Those that are so left are the reprobate, and the others are the elect or predestinated.' CAUDEN.

PRIEST, s. The Priest, under the law, was a person consecrated and ordained of God, not only to teach the people, and pray for them, but also to offer up sacrifices for his own sins, and those of the people, Le. 4:5. Before the promulgation of the law, the first-born of every family was a priest, but afterwards, the priesthood was limited to the tribe of Levi, Nu. 16:40.
The Priest is properly applied to Christ, of whom the high-priests were types, He. 7:17.
|| 21:12. The word is also applied to true believers, who are enabled to offer spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise to God, 1 Pe. 2:5.

PROSELYTE, s. In Greek Proselytos, which signifies a stranger. The Hebrew word Ger, or Necher, has the same signification. The Jews had two kinds of proselytes or converts;
Proselytes of the Gate, who worshipped the true
God, but did not submit to Jewish rites; and Proselytes of Justice, who submitted to the whole Jewish religion. These they allowed all privileges of this life, and the life to come.

The Jews give the name of proverbs, parables, or similitudes, to moral sentences, maxims, comparisons, or enigmas, expressed in a style that is poetical, figurative, close and sentences: They call this kind of proverb, Mishle.

PSALM, s. From the Gr. Psallo, which signifies to touch sweetly. Psalms or Hymns are composed of words pithy and affecting, and commonly limited to a certain number of syllables, or feet.

The Psalms are properly placed in the middle of the Bible, being the very soul of godly experience, and of the whole gospel.

By the late Hebrew writers they are called Sepher-

Tehillim, or Tehilloth, i. e. the book of Hymns

or praises, because the subject thereof is the high praises of God. In 2 S. 23:1. they are called

Zimroth Jisrael, i. e. the Psalms of Israel. In the N. T. Psalmi, i. e. Psalms.

The book of Psalms is more frequently quoted in the N. T. than any other. Some note that it is quoted 64 times, and Isaiah 60. But I have counted 140 vs. in the N. T. in which this book is — HENRY'S KEY.

REFUGE, s. a strong hold or place of safety.
Nu. 35:13.

Six cities were appointed for refuge, three on the east of Jordan, Bezer, i. e. fortification; Ra-moth-Gilead, i. e. exalted, and Golan, i. e. passage, revolution, or passing over. And three on the west of Jordan, Kedesh, i. e. holiness; Shechem,
i. e. a part, or portion, and Hebron, i. e.
fellowship, Jos. 20:7, 8. These were cities for the anavayer to take refuge in, and were typical of Christ, who is appointed a refuge for sinners to flee to, and find safety and rest in from sin, death, and hell, Pr. 18:10. Ge. 6:18.

REPENTANCE, s. is either, (1) Distress and trouble for the calamities procured by sin, in which case Cain, Ahab, and Judas repented, Ge. 4:13. 1 K. 21:29. Mat. 27:3. Or, (2) A godly sorrow for sin, on account of its malignant nature, and offensiveness to God, which is accompanied with a hatred of sin, and a love of holiness, Ac. 11:18. 2 Co. 7:10.
 Evangelical repentance is that saving grace wrought in the soul by the Spirit of God, whereby a sinner is made to see and be sensible of his sin, to grieve and humble before God on account of it, not so much for the punishment for which sin has made him liable, as that thereby God is dishonored, and offended (his rights infringed), his laws (seen as holy, just, and righteous) violated, and his own soul polluted and defiled; and this grief arises from love to God, and is accompanied with a hatred of sin, a fixed resolution to forsake it, and an expectation of favor and forgiveness through the merits of Christ. Mat. 3:8. Ac. 3:19. 2 Co. 7:10. CRUEN.
 Repentance, when ascribed to God, does not intend a change of his mind, but a change of his outward conduct in his dispensations, Ma. 3:6. Jn. 1:17.

SACRIFICE, s. is a solemn act of religious worship, which consisted in offering up, or devoting something, animate or inanimate, on an altar, by the hands of a priest, either as an expression of gratitude to God, for some special favor, or to obtain their dependence on him, or to conciliate his favor. Sacrifices were in use before, as well as under the law of Moses, and were of beasts, birds, bread, oil, &c. They may be distinguished into, (1) Typical sacrifices, as those already mentioned, Ex. 12:27. (2) The perfect, all-sufficient, and infinite sacrifice of Christ, whereby he hath atoned for and put away sin, He. 9:26 and reconciled us to God, Col. 1:21, 22. (3)

SADDUCEES, s. Just men, Syr. Cod. or schisms.
So called from Sadoe, their first founder, who lived under Antigonos Sotichus, who succeeded Simon the Just. They rejected all Scripture except the five books of Moses, denied the immortality of the soul, future rewards, the resurrection of the body, and existence of angels or spirits.

 1 Th. 4:3. this is the will of God, even your s.
 4. should know how to possess his vessel in 2 Th. 2:13. through s. of the Spirit, 1 Pe. 1:2.
SANCTIFY, v. signifies, (1) To separate, set apart, and appoint any thing to a holy use,
 Ge. 2:3. Ex. 13:2. He. 10:14. (2) To cleanse and purify sinners from the guilt, power, and pollution of sin, by the blood of Christ, and mighty operations of the Spirit of holiness, Ex. 36:25. 1 Co. 1:30. 6:11. Ti. 3:5,6. He. 9:14. This consists in mortification of sin, Col. 3:5. and vivification of grace, 2 Co. 4:16. Col. 3:10. (3) To honor and magnify, Ex. 36:23. (4) To free the creature from the curse that sin has brought on it, 1 Ti. 4:5.
Sanctification differs from Justification.
 1. Justification is a change of our state from guilt and curse, to pardon and acquittance; sanctification is a change of our nature from death to life, and from uncleanness to holiness. 2. Justification is an instantaneous act, and completes at once; sanctification is gradual, and not complete till death. 3. Justification is by imputation of Christ's righteousness to us; sanctification is by grace communicated to us from Christ. 4. Justification is the cause; sanctification is the effect.

SCORPION, s. A venomous reptile, compared like a small lobster, with a long, slender tail, and a deadly sting at the end of it. It has a bladder full of dangerous poison. Its head appears to be joined to the breast. It has 2 eyes in the middle of its head, and 2 towards its extremity, between which come out, as it were, 2 arms, which are divided into 2, like the claws of a lobster. It has 5 legs proceeding from its breast, and every one divided into 6 parts, covered with hair, at the end whereof are 6 talons or claws. The belly is divided into 7 rings, from the last of which the tail proceeds, which is divided into 7 little heads, of which the last is armed with a sting, filled with a cold poison, which it squirts into the part which it stings. The scorpion is of a blackish color, like soot; it is sullen as it goes; and flies violently with its snout, and by its feet, on such persons as it seizes, so that it cannot be plucked off but with difficulty. The best and surest remedy against the bite is said to be to squeeze it to pieces on the wound. It is said the dam brings forth 11 small, wormlike and round young, who, after they are hatched, kill their mother.

It is put for, (1) Stinging punishments, 1 K. 12: 11. (2) Cruel people, Ez. 2:6. (3) Antichristian heretics, Re. 9:3, 10.

 SELA *is a word found 74 times in the book of Psalms, and thrice in Habakkuk. Some think signifies a rest or pause or singing, or a change of tone or notes, the elevation of the voice, or a high note. Also, forever, or so be it. It is in general concluded that it properly signifies the end or pause. See Ps. 3:2, 4, 8. || 4:2, 4. || 7:5. || 9:16. &c.

SONG, S. s. They are, 1. Divine, as, (1) The songs of Moses and Israel. Ex. 15:1. De. 32. Re. 15:3. (2) Of Deborah. Jud. 5:12. (3) Of David. Ps. 77:8. (4) Of Solomon, called the Song of Songs; in Hebrew, Shir Hashirim, the most excellent of all songs. As a servant of ornaments is the wisest slave, and vanity of vanities the depth of vanity; and as Lord of lords, King of kings, Holy of holies, express the highest and most glorious; so Song of Songs is expression of the singular excellency of that song above all others. (5) Of Zion or the church. Ps. 137:3. (6) Of Christ. 1a. 5:1. Re. 14:3. 11. Spiritual. Ex. 5:19. 111. Wicked. Jb. 30:9. Ps. 69:12. Ec. 7:5.

 SOUL. s. Heb. Nephesh; in Gr. Psuche. It signifies, (1) That rational, spiritual, and immortal substance in man, which is the origin of our thoughts, desires, and reasonings; and bears some resemblance of the divine Mak.
 Mat. 10:28. (2) The whole person, both soul and body, Ge. 1:25. (3) The life of man, Ps.
 31:19. (4) Desire, love, inclination, Ge. 23:18.
 (5) The spirit of a brute, Ge. 1:24. Le. 17:
 31. Ex. 3:21.
 The eternal salvation of one soul is of greater importance, and big with greater concern, than the temporal salvation of a whole kingdom, though a care for the space of ten thousand ages; because there will come up a point, an instant in eternity, when that one soul shall have existed as many ages, as all the individuals of a whole kingdom, ranged in close succession, will in the whole have existed in the space of ten thousand ages: Therefore one soul is capable of a larger share of happiness or misery, throughout an endless eternity, for that will still be before it, more than a whole kingdom is capable of in ten thousand ages. Dr. Doddridge.

STOCKS, A sect of heathen philosophers; the followers of Zeno, who used to teach under a porch, or portico. They held that a wise man ought to be free from all passions, as they esteemed all things to be ordered by necessity and fate.
 Josephus says, that the Pharisees approach very near to the sentiments of the Stoics. They affected the same stiffness, petulance, equality, austerity.

and insensibility. The Stoics were in considerable numbers at Athens, where Paul came there. Ac. 17:18.

 SUN, s. is put for, (1) Jesus Christ, Ma. 4:2.
 (2) God's special favor and grace, Pa. 84:11.
 (3) Comfort and joy, Job. 30:28. (4) Prosperity and peace, Job. 31:38. Is. 60:19:20. (5) The beauty and purity of the church, Song. 6:9.
 Christ may be compared to the Sun, (1) On account of its unity, there is but one Sun, 1 Ti.
 2:5. (2) The Sun is the source of light, Jn.
 1:14. (3) The Sun is a pure, bright, and refugent creature, Pa. 45:1. He. 1:3. (4) The Sun hath his orb or tent, Pa. 10:4. He. 7:25. (5) The Sun is a communicating being, Jn. 1:16. (6)
 The Sun is subject to the command of God, Jo.
 10:12. Jn. 14:10. (7) The Sun is a universal light to all the world, Jn. 1:9. 8:12. (8) The Sun is the superintendent over the world, the governor and head of influences, Mat. 26:18.
 Jn. 17:2. Ep. 1:22. He. 1:2. (9) The Sun is a great, powerful, and magnificent being, Jer.
 33:24. Song 5:10-16. (10) The Sun expels darkness, Is. 42:6. 49:9. (11) The Sun is a wonderful and astonishing creature; all behold
 it with admiration, and some have ignorantly worshipped it as a god, Is. 9:6. 1 Ti. 3:16.
 (12) The actions and influences of the Sun are very strong and powerful, Ps. 110:3. (13) The Sun exhales and dries up the gross and filthy vapors of the earth, Ez. 36:28. Mat. 9:29.
 (14) The Sun is, as it were, the life and soul of the world, producing variety of fruits in the earth, Ec. 1:5. 5:25. Ga. 5:22. (15) The Sun doth not visit every hemisphere, nor shine in every horizon at the same time; and it differs in degrees of heat, in the respective latitudes, according as they are nearer to, or more remote from, the equinoctial, Ps. 147:19:20. Mat. 11:25:26.
 Ro. 9:15, 16. (16) The Sun is of a warming, heating, reviving nature, Ma. 4:2. Ps. 30:5.
 Ho. 14:5, 6, 7. (17) The Sun operates according to the matter it shines upon; it softens wax, hardens clay, Ec. Lu. 22:61, 62. 2 Co. 2:15, 16.
 (18) The Sun is often covered with clouds, Ps.
 30:7. (19) The Sun absorbs and swallows up the glory of the lesser luminaries, Ps. 73:25.
 Song 5:10. (20) The light of the Sun affords great pleasure, Ec. 1:17. Ps. 80:1, 19. Phil. 3:13.

 SURETY, s. Christ is the surety of the better testament, or covenant, He. 7:22. The word signifies, one that draws right; Christ drew right to his Father in the counsel of peace and undertook to be the savior and redeemer of his people; he substituted himself in their place and stood; he interposed between the creditor and the debtor, and became surety for the payment of the debt of the latter, and so stood engaged for them, and in their room. Christ is not the surety for the Father to his people, but for them to the Father;
 as to satisfy for their sin, to work out a righteousness for them, to preserve and keep them, and make them happy, which is an instance of matchless love. Dr. GILL.

SYCAMORE, s. s. is a tree called the Egyptian
fig-tree; its name is composed of Sycon, a fig-tree, and Moros, a mulberry-tree. It partakes of the nature of each of these trees; of the mulberry-tree in its leaves, and of the fig-tree in its fruit. [The plane-tree (tr. chestnut) is like our button-wood.]

Ex. 5:8. t. of bricks which they, 18. 1 S. 18:27. in full t. || 1 Ch. 9:28. out by t. TALENT, s. Ps. The common talent was about 40lb. 14oz. That of the temple, 22lb. 8oz. as appears by ceasing up the 3000 shekels, a shekel being 12. 24. or the fourth part of an ounce; therefore a common talent of gold was 2699. 12s. and of silver, 1871. 10s. The talent of the sanctuary was twice as much. In Troy weight a common talent was 622b. 6oz., and a talent of the sanctuary 1254b. If a talent of gold was of no more value than a talent of silver, as some think, then in Troy weight it was but 3lb. 11oz. and in avoirdupois 21b. 14oz.; consequently it is easy to account for the king's crown being a talent of gold, 2 S. 12:30. and it might occasionally be worn without any great inconvenience. TEMPLE s. signifies, (1) A house or dwelling of God; or a building set apart for the worship of the true God. It is spoken, (1) Of that magni- ficent building erected by Solomon at Jerusalem, about 1000 years before Christ. It was the grandest pile of building that was ever erected by man, not for its greatness, it being but 150 feet in length, 105 in breadth, including the sanctuary, structure, and the porch, (according to some);

but its excellency consisted in its materials, construction, and costly ornaments and decorations;

and especially in those marks of divine favor it was honored with, as, (1) The ark of the cove- nant. (2) The Shechinah, or divine presence.

(3) The Urim and Thummim, by which the high-priest consulted God in difficult and important cases. (4) The holy fire, 1 K. 8:38.

(5) The spirit of prophecy. All these were said to be wanting in the second temple; but were eminently in Christ, whose presence in it made the glory of it greater than that of the first temple, Hag. 2:9. (II) It is spoken of the taberna- cle, 1 S. 1:9. || 3:3. (III) Of Christ's body, or human nature, in which the fulness of the Godhead dwells bodily, Jn. 2:19. Col. 2:9. (IV) Of the church of God, 2 Co. 6:16. (V) Of heaven, which is God's throne, Ps. 11:4. Re. 7:15.

(VI) Of individual Christians, 1 Co. 3:16. 17.

 THUMMIM. Urim and Thummim signify light and perfection, or the shining and the perfect; according to Jerome, doctrine and judgment;

the LXX, declaration, or manifestation, and truth. There are various conjectures about the Urim and Thummim, whether they were the stones in the high-priest's breast-plate, or something distinct from them; which it is not worth our while to inquire into, since God has left it a secret. It is evident that the Urim and Thummim were appointed to inquire of God by, on momentous occasions; and continued in use (as some think) only till the building of Solomon's temple; and all conclude, that this was never restored after its destruction.

It is thought that it was the butchery, or place of slaughter at Jerusalem, lying to the S. of the city, in the valley of the children of Hinnon;
and that a constant fire used to be kept there, for the carcasses and other filthiness brought thither from the city; on which account, perhaps, it is made a figure of hell, Is. 30:33.

TRIBUTE, s. s. Greek, Thoros; is Hebrew, Mass, from the word Mass, to melt, or liquify. The Hebrews acknowledged none for sovereign over them, but God alone: whence Josephus calls their government a Theocracy, or divine government. This they acknowledged by a tribute, or capitation, of half a shekel a head, which every Israelite paid yearly, Ezr. 30:13. Tribute is a sum of money paid to princes or rulers, in token of the duty and subjection which subjects owe unto them; and as a recompense for their care and industry, and in order to support them in their authority and dignity. UNICORN, s. s. Gr. Monoceros; in Heb. Reem.
It is disputed among the learned, whether there ever was such a creature as we call the Unicorn; or whether this Reem be the Rhinoceros, as some would have it; or a kind of wild goat called Oryx, which is very large, strong, and untractable; or a sort of wild ox or bull, called Uri; which some think the most probable opinion, as best agreeing with the Scripture accounts. CRUEN.

It is said to have but one horn growing out of its forehead, between its eyelids, which is not hollow, light, nor smooth; but hard as iron, rough as a file, sharp and straight as a dart, and black, except at the point. WILSON.

Head of the S. African Unicorn, procured by Campbell.

*USURY, a. is a certain gain or profit which a person makes of his money or goods by lending the same. This is, if by a common profit, lawful: but it is generally taken in an evil sense,
viz. for an unlawful profit which a person makes of his money or goods. The Hebrew word for usury signifies: liting. All usury among the Israelites was forbidden: but to a stranger they might lend upon usury, De. 23:20. This law of not taking usury appears to be peculiar to the Jewish state, for to us it seems as equitable to make profit of our money as of our lands.

 VOCATION, s. or Calling. Ep. 4:1.
 VOICE, s. The daughter of the voice, called in Hebrew, Bath-kol, was, as the Jewish writers say, a preternatural way in which God discovereth his will to them after prophecy had ceased in Israel. On this Bath-kol, which they pretended was an articulate voice from God, as he spoke to Samuel, are founded many of their traditions and customs of their nation.

 WILLY, a. Jos. 9:4. Gibeonites did work w.
 WILLY, a. is that faculty of the soul whereby we freely choose to or refuse. The will is naturally prone to evil; but may choose good under the influence of that true light, that enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world. Jn. 1:9.
 The will of God is taken, (1) For his irresistible operations, Is. 43:13. Ro. 9:19. (2) For his purpose and counsel, Ep. 1:11. (3) For his precepts and commands, Ho. 13:21.
 God's purposing will is the rule of his conduct;
 his commanding will, the rule of ours.
 The phrase I will is frequently annexed to the promises, to denote their absoluteness and certainty, Jer. 31:33, 34.

 WISDOM, s. Heb. Chachmah; Gr. Sophia.
 Wisdom, knowledge; and understanding, are generally looked upon as synonymous terms, or words of the same import; yet, perhaps, they are more accurate who consider them as distinct.
 Knowledge consists in having a stock of judicious and proper ideas and notions of things: Wisdom consists in reducing these to practice, in conducting any affair with prudence and skill. Knowledge hath its seat in the speculative understanding, Wisdom in the practical. Knowledge is an understanding of general rules: Wisdom is a drawing conclusions from these rules, in order to particular cases. A man may have the knowledge of the whole Scripture, and have all learning in the treasury of his memory, and yet be destitute of skill to make use of them on particular occasions. CHAMBERS.

Hence a person may have considerable knowledge, who yet, in respect to wisdom, is a fool. Such are all who know the will of God, but do not, Pr. 17:16.

 WOLF, s. In Hebrew, Zeeb; in Greek, Lycos.
 It is very fierce and voracious, an enemy to cattle, ravenous, greedy, crafty, gregarious, of a quick smell and sight. In the absence of the shepherd and his dog, they enter the fold and kill all therein before they begin to cat.

He reports frequent nausea and vomiting, particularly in the morning. He has noticed a yellowish discoloration of his eyes and skin over the past few weeks. He has no recent travel history and no known contact with individuals who have had similar symptoms. He is currently taking no medications and has no known allergies. His last alcohol consumption was approximately 2 weeks ago.

BIBLICAL LITERATURE.

CHAPTER I.

THE REVIVAL AND PROGRESS OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE.

Revival of Biblical Learning in the Fifteenth Century — Impetus given to Sacred Literature in the Last Century — Philological and Illustrative Writers — Present State of Biblical Learning — Character of Works on Biblical Interpretation — Advantages derivable from Biblical Studies — Division of Biblical Learning — Object and Plan of the present Work.

1. THE progress of sacred literature in modern times furnishes a topic of gratifying and instructive inquiry, and is fraught with considerations eminently calculated to excite the gratitude and strengthen the convictions of the Christian student.

2. From the 5th to the 15th century, biblical learning was in a deplorably low state. Religious feuds were the curse and disgrace of Christendom. Bitter controversies, touching the forms of religion, or, more properly speaking, touching the powers and functions of those who assumed to be its authorized and exclusive propounders and guardians, absorbed the attention of the Christian world. The Scriptures were only resorted to as the arsenal in which were deposited the aggressive arms of the spiritual combatants; and these were used against each other in the most arbitrary and unskilful manner. All desire for true learning became extinct; the principles of interpretation were lost sight of and forgotten; and there were few who could even read, and much less understand, the text of the sacred books. In the 12th century, the Scriptures were torn in pieces between two parties: the scholastic theologians, who, by a perverse use of the Aristotelian philosophy, reduced the doctrines of religion to a number of absurd subtleties, incomprehensible by all minds — not excepting their own; and the biblical doctors, who, by a system of mystical and allegorical interpretation, perverted and darkened the sublime truths of Scripture, and rendered their meaning a matter of doubt and uncertainty. The insane religious wars called the crusades were, however, overruled by Providence to the most beneficial purposes. By introducing into Europe a number of learned Greeks, they originated a spirit of inquiry in Italy and elsewhere; while the universities shortly afterwards established, and in which the oriental languages were cultivated, tended greatly to the revival of learning, and prepared the way for an improved system of Scripture interpretation.

3. As early as the latter end of the 15th century, some vigorous efforts were made to promote the rational interpretation of the sacred writings. The laborers, however, were few, and the aids they possessed for the elucidation of the text were scanty and imperfect. Early in the 17th century, their numbers were greatly increased, and we find many names distinguished in the republic of letters, who were then successfully cultivating this branch of learning. By the middle of this century, the number of biblical students was considerably augmented and the result of their labors proportionately increased. After all, however, those who were at this time devoted to the pursuit of scriptural inquiries formed but an insignificant band, and were regarded by their contemporaries as the students of an isolated branch of learning, too uninteresting in aspect, and too limited in results, to command or reward general attention.

4. Towards the close of the 17th century, biblical learning was brought into more general favor, and assumed a more popular and inviting form. It was no longer viewed as the exclusive possession of the clerical body, but as forming part of the common property of the republic of letters. Numerous and valuable acquisitions were made to the previously existing stock of materials.

5. The enlightened and indefatigable exertions of Mill, Wetstein, Griesbach, and Kennicott, were directed to a restoration of the integrity or purity of the sacred text; while the learned and ingenious Shaw, whose 'Travels and Observations, relating to several parts of Barbary and the Levant,' appear to have attracted the notice of the celebrated Harmer, pointed out a new and indispensable source of biblical illustration, viz. attention to the customs of the eastern people. About the same period, Michaëlis was engaged in a similar course, on a large scale, and had induced the king of Denmark to send a deputation of learned travellers, to pursue the necessary inquiries, under his directions, in Egypt and Syria. The result of their voyage was given, in French, by Mons. Niebuhr, whose work is not yet translated.

6. From this new era, the sphere of biblical research and illustration has been gradually enlarging. The metaphysician and the naturalist, the antiquary and the traveller, the philologist and the historian, have contributed their respective shares. The materials now collected are numerous and valuable; and scarcely a month passes without furnishing the most unquestionable evidence that their value is well understood by those competent to employ them, in removing obscurities, clearing up difficulties, eliciting new beauties, or edifying further instruction from that Book which is above all price. But much remains to be done to render these aids available for general use.

7. Hitherto, with but one or two exceptions, the method in which the several branches of criticism and interpretation have been treated, has restricted the study of these topics to those whose professional engagements have rendered such study imperative; or to those whose learning and leisure have induced them to look upon it as a source of mere intellectual enjoyment.

8. But much of that description of learning which the art of interpretation requires, may be brought within the reach, and be adapted to the comprehension, of persons whose minds are not above the ordinary standard, and whose circumstances require that much of their time and attention should be given to other affairs. The advantages of such an extension of biblical knowledge would soon be apparent, in the growing maturity and perfection of the Christian character, and in the increased usefulness and efficiency of the Christian ministry.

9. Biblical learning is usually divided into two principal branches, intimately connected:—

(1) BIBLICAL CRITICISM, which treats of the laws by which the genuineness or purity of the text is decided, and restored;

(2) BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION, which treats of the rules by which the sense of the text is to be deduced and exhibited, and includes biblical antiquities.

10. The object of this work being to furnish the unlearned as well as the more erudite with a comprehensive and practically useful digest of the several topics connected with the interpretation of the sacred writings, BIBLICAL CRITICISM, as it pertains to the original text, will be despatched in a much more summary way than the matters incident to INTERPRETATION.

11. First, then, we shall direct our attention to the text of the Bible, with a view to ascertain, in a general way, its original character, and the securities we possess for its present integrity. This will bring under review the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures, and the various accidents to which literary compositions are liable in passing down the stream of time, from a period antecedent to the invention of printing; more particularly those which have occurred to the sacred writings. Thence we shall be led to inquire into the character and value of various readings, or the different wording of the same passage in the several manuscripts and other extant documents comprising the sacred text, or portions of it; the sources in which they have originated; and the means we possess for correcting the errors that may have crept into the text. We may then review the progress that has been made towards restoring the text to its original purity, and the methods by which this has been effected. Having thus ascertained the actual state of the books, the contents of which it is proposed to investigate, we may proceed, step by step, through the several rules of interpretation. This will exhibit the means that may be legitimately employed for educating the sense of the language used by the sacred writers. Thus we shall be introduced to almost every variety of subject comprised in the Bible, and clearly ascertain what qualifications are indispensable to its sound interpretation.

CHAPTER II.

BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

THE immediate object, then, of sound criticism is, not to understand and interpret the holy Scriptures, but to examine their genuineness and uncorruptness, to assign reasons for deeming any particular passage to have been altered from its original state, and to propose the surest means by which such passage may be restored, with the greatest certainty or probability, to its pristine condition.

There are four principal sources of criticism. The first is, an accurate acquaintance with the peculiarities of the language wherein, not merely the sacred Scriptures in general, but each particular book was composed. The second is a comparison of the various manuscripts or copies which we have of them, originating at various periods. The third consists of the various translations which have been made of them into foreign languages. The fourth and last, which must be employed but seldom, springs from the writings and remains of the earlier Fathers, and generally of the earlier ecclesiastical writers, who have made some use of the Bible.* The sections of this chapter will be devoted to a general review of these several topics.

SECTION I.

THE HEBREW AND GREEK SCRIPTURES.

The Original Languages of Scripture — The Aramaean Language — Language in which Matthew's Gospel and the Epistle to the Hebrews were written — Peculiar Style of the New Testament — The Genuineness of the New Testament demonstrable from its Style — Importance of Hebrew and Greek Learning to an Interpreter — Historical Account of the Hebrew Language — Various Schools of Hebrew Philology.

1. Speaking in general terms, it may be stated that Hebrew and Greek are the two languages employed by the Author of revelation, to convey a knowledge of his will and purpose to mankind.

2. THE BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT were, with the exception of a few passages, composed in the Heb. The exceptions relate to passages written in the Chaldee dialect, the reasons for employing which, where it occurs, are sufficiently obvious. They are passages either consisting of transcripts from original documents, or comprising information specially designed to be communicated to the people by whom this dialect was employed. Thus, Jer. 10:11, which is pure Chaldee, introduced into the midst of a Heb. composition, was to be addressed by the Jews to the Babylonian idolaters. Several passages in Ezra 4. 5. 6. 7. consist of copies of original letters and decrees, in the Chaldee; and the book of Daniel, from the 2d ch. to the 7th, which is in this language, treats exclusively of the affairs of Babylon, and was, therefore, with the utmost propriety so written.

3. THE BOOKS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT are all in the Greek language, which, being the [richest and] most prevalent at the time they were penned, was most adapted for works designed for general circulation.†

4. There are but two of these books about which the learned are not agreed, as to the language in which they were originally composed; namely, the Gospel of Matthew, and the Epistle to the Hebrews, the latter of which is attributed to Paul, upon very conclusive evidence. These books, it has been thought by very able critics, were written in the Heb., or rather in the Syro-Chaldaic tongue, which was the vernacular language of the Jews in the time of our Savior; and, consequently, that our present Greek text is only a translation from the originals. This position is, for several reasons, untenable; but to enter into a critical investigation of it would not accord with our present purpose.‡

5. It must not be supposed, however, that the Greek of the N. T. is of the pure classical style. On the contrary, it is of a very peculiar structure, partaking of the Alexandrian and oriental idioms, with a very large admixture of the peculiarities of the Heb. phraseology. Hence it has not improperly been called Hebraic-Greek. This topic has been very elaborately discussed by critics, but the result of their labors is all that is practically valuable to the interpreter of Scripture. Michaelis has thus characterized the style of the several writers of the N. T., and with sufficient minuteness for general purposes.¶

6. The gospels of Matthew and Mark exhibit strong vestiges of the Hebraic style; the former presents harsher Hebraisms than the latter; and the Gospel of Mark abounds with still more striking Hebraisms. The epistles of James and Jude are, somewhat better; but even these are full of Hebraisms, and betray in other respects a certain Hebrew tone. Luke has, in several passages, written pure and classic Greek, of which the first four vs. of his gospel may be given as an instance. In the sequel, where he describes the actions of Christ, he has very harsh Hebraisms; yet his style is more agreeable than that of Matthew or Mark. In the Acts, he is not free from Hebraisms, which he never seems studiously to have avoided; but his periods are more classically turned, and sometimes possess beauty devoid of art. John has numerous, though not uncouth, Hebraisms, both in his gospel and in his epistles; but he has written in a smooth and flowing language, and surpasses all the Jewish writers in the excellence of narrative. Paul, again, is entirely different from them all: his style is, indeed, neglected, and full of Hebraisms, but he has avoided the concise and verse-like construction of the Hebrew language, and has, upon the whole, a considerable share of the roundness of Grecian composition. It is evident that he was as perfectly acquainted with the Greek manner of expression as with the Hebrew; and he has introduced them alternately, as either the one or the other suggested itself the first, or was the best approved.

7. Neither our limits nor plan will permit enlargement on this topic. Mr. Horne has given numerous instances of the Hebraisms, Syriasms, and Latinisms, in the N. T.; also the cautions laid down by Ernesti and his commentator, Morus, by which to determine their force and meaning.††

8. The style of the sacred writings furnishes, too, one of the most incontestable and satisfactory proofs of their genuineness. The variation in style that prevails in the

O. T. books, is found to correspond most exactly with the changes which the Heb. language underwent, from time to time, by reason of the intercourse of the Jewish people with the adjacent nations; while the peculiarity of composition by which the N. T. books are characterized affords decisive evidence of their Hebrew authorship, as well as their particular era.‡‡

9. In a work intended for popular use, it will be expected we should give some historical account of the Hebrew and Greek languages, only as far as is necessary in a bibliographical account of the sacred text.

(1) The Hebrew language was so named by the forefathers of the Israelitish nation; but whether from Heber, one of the descendants of Shem (Gen. 10:21, 25; 11:14, 16, 17), or after Abraham, who, from the circumstance of his having come from the other side of the Euphrates, was called habyr, the Hebrew, 'the over-passenger' (from the root hbr, to pass over), has long been a matter of controversy. It might also have been called the Jewish language, as being that employed by the subjects of the Jewish kingdom (2 K. 18:26; 2 Chr. 32:18; Is. 36:11); and also the Canaanitish (Is. 19:18), not only because it was used in the country of Canaan by the Israelites, but also because the language of the Canaanites was, in origin and genius, the same with that of the Hebrews. The Jews, after their return from Babylon, entitled it the holy language.

(2) The antiquity of the Hebrew language is very great, and its original, in the opinion of the most learned men, must be referred to an age long prior to the origin of the Israelitish race. Nay, it even seems to have been coeval with the human race, and to have been the language which, surviving the deluge with Noah, was the only dialect in the new world, and common to the succeeding generations (Gen. 11:1). It afterwards contracted a degree of diversity among the different nations which bordered upon each other, such as we observe in the dialects of one and the same language; but, among the Hebrews, it seems probable that, approaching nearest to its primitive nature and genius, it of all the others retained the clearest marks of that simplicity which is peculiar to children, and points, in no obscure manner, to the infancy of the human race. Its adolescence, or the period of its development towards that degree of perfection we find it to have attained in the O. T. does not extend beyond the age of David and Solomon, and the age of the prophet schools established by Samuel; its golden age lasted from the time of David to the Babylonian captivity, and during this period, probably, great part of the sacred writings of the Jews was composed. After the invasion of Palestine by the Assyrian and Chaldean rulers of Babylon, things were completely changed. The Jews of Palestine, along with their political independence, lost also the peculiar character of their language. The Babylonian-Aramaic dialect expelled the Heb., and gradually became the predominant language of Palestine, which it continued to be till the Christian

† Perhaps, also, the revelations of the Gospel could not have been given in a language so primitive, meagre, and unpliant as the Heb.; while the copious and flexible idiom of the Greek had been in a course of formation and polishing by the first human intellects, for ages, doubtless for this very purpose in God's providence. §§ This dialect is very erroneously called the Chaldaic. With the language of Babylon (so Pharruch) we are well acquainted; but the true Chaldaic, probably more intimately related to the Persian, Median, Armenian, and Kurdic, nobody knows. [Col. era, if not later. See Ac. i. 19; 21:40; 22:2.

(3) There is a difference of opinion among critics as to the antiquity of the Hebrew letters now in common use. There is good reason to think that they are substantially the same in form as those originally used in the writing of the Aramaic languages. For as, in the East, the art of writing was in use from the very earliest times, so the same mode of writing these ancient languages always prevailed; which, in the course of time, acquired some diversity in its form, among the different nations to which it was common, but among the Hebrews deviated less from its original form than among the other nations. The letters originally used by the Hebrews were probably more roundly shaped, and in that form continued to be written down to the time of the Babylonian captivity. On the return of the people to Judea, their alphabetic characters underwent some change, by which they were rendered more elegant in their form, but without destroying their identity. This revision of the Hebrew alphabet is, with some reason, attributed to Ezra, the great Jewish reformer.

(4) Of the final Hebrew letters we have no means of determining the antiquity. It is thought that they were in use before the Alexandrian version was made, being originally employed to express numbers greater than those denoted by the common letters of the alphabet, and subsequently placed at the end of words, as a matter of taste for the eye.

(5) The vowel points have long been a subject of controversy, sometimes very bitterly carried on, among the friends of biblical literature. Happily, the controversy may now be considered as closed, and infinitely more important matters, touching the philosophy of the language and the science of Scripture, have secured the public attention. There is reason to think that the ancient Hebrews had certain marks for vowels, which, where it seemed necessary, might be attached to the letters, but which, like those used by the Arabians at the present day, and by the ancient Syrians, were very few, probably only three, and those of the most simple form. But it is by no means probable that vowel marks of any sort were of the same high antiquity with the letters. Small points were, perhaps, first added to some words, by which the diversity of pronunciation and signification was indicated. These, in process of time, are likely to have given rise to the vowel points, which were the invention of the Masoretes, or other learned Jews in later ages, who applied themselves with unparalleled assiduity to the grammar and criticism of the sacred books. Their object was to transmit to posterity the ancient pronunciation of the words; and, certainly, no better method than that of points could be adopted for this purpose. The letters aleph (א), vau (ו), yod (י), called matres lectionis (note, § ii. 2, 6), or the principal helps for reading without points, are an invention of modern times, to supply, in some measure, the place of the points.

(6) Nor do the diacritic points, attached to some letters, seem to have been originally employed, although they are certainly, for the most part, adapted to the ancient mode of pronunciation; as, for instance, the point of the letter ayin or ayin, dagesh or mappik. The Arabians and Syrians have similar points, the invention of modern times.

(7) The unchanging nature of the Hebrew language, as observable in almost all the writings of the O. T., deserves to be remarked. In the great diversity of ages and authors, and of style, both prose and poetical, this language retains the highest similarity. In the writings composed before the Babylonian captivity, very little change is observable in it. But, after the Hebrews had been expelled from their country, and were scattered among other nations, they were unable to regain the original purity and strength of their language, even in the best times after their restoration to their country. At last, in consequence of the vicissitudes to which they were subjected, and particularly the final destruction of their state by the Romans, the Hebrew language went altogether out of common use, so that even the more learned and skilful Jews were unable, in their writings, to exhibit its native image when now dead.

(8) The Heb. writings comprised in the O. T. are the only ones that remain in that language; consequently these writings are the only pure source whence a knowledge of the language is to be derived. These, however, will be insufficient, in some cases, to fix the undoubted meaning of words, especially of those words that are but seldom used. We must, therefore, seek for additional assistance; and our safest and most useful resort is to the allied and cognate oriental languages, these being so many dialects of the same original tongue, which, though having peculiarities belonging to each, are radically or primarily the same. The following are the chief of these:—the Arabic, Aramaean, Samaritan, and Ethiopic; to which some add the Talmudic and Rabbinical.

(9) The Heb. is allowed to possess great simplicity and expressiveness. Of all known languages, it is best adapted to indicate the nature and qualities of objects; and this, taken in conjunction with the great conformity subsisting between it and our own language, both in structure and mode of expression, renders its attainment comparatively easy. The construction of Hebrew words in a sentence has the advantage of being extremely simple, and is free from the elliptical and irregular phraseology that often perplexes the student in other languages. The words commonly stand in their natural order, and sentences admit of being translated into English without any change of arrangement. The chief exception is, that nominatives very frequently follow their verbs, and adjectives their substantives. The rules are few, and the exceptions not numerous.

10. We close this section with some account of the principal of the various schools of Hebrew philology:—

1. The Rabbinical. This school, which is properly indigenous among the Jews, derives its acquaintance with the Hebrew from the tradition of the synagogue; from the Chaldee Targums; from the Talmud; from the Arabic, which was the language of some of the most learned rabbins; and from conjectural interpretation. In this school, at one of its earlier periods, Jerome acquired his knowledge of the language; and, on the revival of learning, our first Christian Hebraists in the West were also educated in it, having had none but rabbins for their teachers. In consequence of this, the Jewish system of interpretation was introduced into the Christian church by Reuchlin, Sebastian Munster, Sanctes Pagninus, and the elder Buxtorf; and its principles still continue to exert a powerful and extensive influence through the medium of the grammatical and lexicographical works of the last-men-

* Upon the change that was effected in the language spoken in Palestine, after the return from Babylon, Dr. Pfannkuche's Treatise on the language of Palestine in the age of Christ unfolds a theory which may now be considered as settled, and finally received among the learned. He maintains that the language of Palestine was, in ancient times, the common language of Western Asia, the Aramaean, the same as that which was spoken by the Canaanite natives, and which, subsequently, to the Hebrews—the progeny of Abraham, who was a new settler in that country—was called the Hebrew language, it being the peculiar language of that nation; that, by the Babylonish captivity, this old Hebrew tongue was superseded by the Aramaic, which was current in Babylon, and which, as its pronunciation was somewhat broad and vulgar, bore the same relationship to the Hebrew as the lower Saxon dialect does to high German (or, as his translator suggests, as lowland Scottish does to English); and that this Babylonian Aramaic soon became the national language of the Jews, the ancient Hebrew for some time still remaining the language of literature. By way of distinguishing this from other dialects, he proposes to call it by the simple name of PALESTINIAN ARAMAIC, or PALESTINIAN SYRIAC, Aramaic and Syriac being completely equivalent. See his 'Treatise on the Language of Palestine, in the Age of Christ and his Apostles,' in the BIBLICAL CABINET, vol. ii.

Dr. Eichhorn, who adopts Pfannkuche's theory, in all its essential points, has some remarks upon this subject, which, as they are brief and valuable, we transcribe:—

At the time of Christ, the ancient Heb. was completely extinct, even in its character of language of literature, and all the Jews of that period, residing in Palestine, spoke and wrote the Aramaic. Jesus, too, spoke this language; and the names Xephas (Jn. 1:42), Boanerges (Mk. 3:17), Barnabas (Ac. 4:36), as also the expressions Talitha Kumi (Mk. 5:41), Eli, Eli, Eli, &c. (Mat. 27:46), are specimens of it. Pfannkuche has collected many additional expressions, as specimens of this language, in the treatise already referred to, pp. 67—69. Josephus has also many Aramaic expressions in his 'Antiquities,' and 'Wars,' which the same critic has collected, pp. 70, 71.

People of biblical education spoke this language as written, but the common people, as generally is the case, spoke it in different dialects. The dialect of Jerusalem and Judea was most correct; but that of Galilee, and particularly of Galilee, was much more rude than the former, full of contractions and mutilations; letters were omitted in it, and one letter exchanged for another; so that, for example, according to the usual and irregular pronunciation of the Galilean dialect, the same word might denote an axe, vine, wood, and a comb to be carried. A Galilean was, therefore, easily recognized by his pronunciation (Mat. 26:73), and never admitted as a public reader of Scripture in any synagogue of Judea.

Jews residing abroad in Greek countries, particularly in Egypt, had completely adopted the Greek language as their own; and, even in Palestine itself, where adherence against every thing foreign was affected, it seems that, partly through intercourse with Jews abroad who spoke Greek, partly through the neighborhood to Syria and Egypt, where Greek was generally spoken, and partly from Greek residents, of whom, especially in Galilee and Perea, vast numbers dwelt among the Jews, the Greek had become generally known and current. This appears from Ac. 27—31, where Jews, from Greek countries and provinces, witnessing the enthusiasm which had seized the apostles and their friends, wondered that they expressed their religious thoughts and sentiments in Greek dialects, which they had been accustomed to hear abroad, and not merely, as was usual, in ancient Hebrew; likewise from Ac. 6:1—6, where a considerable number of the primitive members of the Christian community at Jerusalem is stated to have been Hellenistic, or Greek-speaking; and also from Ac. 22:40, compared with 22:2, where the Jews expected Paul, who had been accused by Greek Jews, to address them in Greek, but were delighted to hear him speak to them in the language of the country. Whether Jesus Himself spoke Greek, cannot be determined for certain, although it is highly probable; because in Galilee and Perea He was in frequent intercourse with foreigners; because, even in Jerusalem, an interview with Him was sought by Greeks (Jn. 12:20), and these, surely, spoke no other language but Greek; because we must suppose that the conferences between Jesus and Pilate, mentioned in Jn. 18:33—37, and 19:9—11, were certainly carried on neither in Aramaic nor Latin, but in Greek; and because Mary, in her conversation with Jesus (Jn. 20:14, &c.), seems to have made use of the Greek language, until she recognized Him as risen from the dead, when she instantly returns to the familiar Aramaic, to which, in daily intercourse with Him, she was accustomed, and addressed Him with the word Rabboni. The apostles, too, being Galileans, must be supposed to have been more or less acquainted with Greek, even during the three years of their familiar intercourse with Jesus, although it may have been only at a subsequent period that they, in their vocation as messengers of the gospel, rendered themselves more perfect masters of it, so as to be able to express in writing their thoughts in that language.—Biblical Cabinet, vol. ii. pp. 87—90. It is right that we should apprise the reader of the objections urged against Pfannkuche's hypothesis, in Hug's Intro. to N. T. pt. ii. ch. i. § 10.

tioned author, and the tinge which they gave to many parts of the biblical translations executed immediately after the Reformation.

2. The Forsterian school, founded about the middle of the sixteenth century by John Forster, a scholar of Reuchlin's, and professor in Tübingen and Wittenberg. This author entirely rejected the authority of the rabbins; and, not being aware of the use to be made of the versions and cognate dialects, laid it down as an incontrovertible principle of Hebrew philology, that a perfect knowledge of the language is to be derived from the sacred text alone, by consulting the connection, comparing the parallel passages, and transposing and changing the Hebrew letters, especially such as are similar in figure. His system was either wholly adopted and extended, or, in part, followed by Bohl, Gusset, Driessen, Stock, and others, whose lexicons all proceed on this self-interpreting principle; but its insufficiency has been shown by J. D. Michaelis, in his 'Investigation of the means to attain a knowledge of the dead language of the Hebrews,' and by Bauer, in his Hermeneut. V. T.

3. The Arcadian school, which proceeds on the principle that the Hebrew, being the primitive language, from which all others have been derived, may be explained by the aid of the Greek, Latin, German, English, &c. Its founder, John Arcarius, professor at Wittenberg, has had but few followers, but among these we may reckon the eccentric Hermann van der Hardt, who attempted to derive the Hebrew from the Greek, which he regarded as the most ancient of all tongues.

4. The Hieroglyphic, or Cabbalistic system, long in vogue among the Jews, but first introduced into Christendom by Caspar Newman, professor at Breslau. It consists in attaching certain mystical and hieroglyphical powers to the different letters of the Hebrew alphabet, and determining the signification of the words according to the position occupied by each letter. This ridiculously absurd hypothesis was ably refuted by the learned Christ. Bened. Michaelis, in a Dissertation printed at Halle, 1709, in 4to, and has scarcely had any abettors; but recently it has been revived by a French academician, whose work on the subject exhibits a perfect anomaly in modern literature. Its title is, 'La Langue Hebraïque Restituée, et la véritable sens des mots Hebreux retabli et prouvé par leur analyse radicale. Par Fabre D'Olivet, a Paris, 1815; 4to. According to this author, א (aleph) is the sign of power and stability; ב (beth), of paternity and virility; ג (gimel), of organic or material development; ד (daleth), of divisible or divided nature; ה (hau), a most mysterious sign, expressive of the connection between being and nonentity, &c. The following specimens of M. D'Olivet's own English version, taken at random from vol. ii., will fill our readers with astonishment at the perversion they display, no less of the powers of the human mind, than of the true principles of language, and of the Scriptures of truth.

'Gen. 28. And-he-appointed, IHOHA, HE-the-Gods, an-enclosure (an organic boundary) in-the-temporal-and-sensible-sphere extracted-from-the-boundless-and-foregoing (time), and-he-laid-up there that-same-Adam whom-he-had-framed-forever.

'22. And-he-restored (in its former state) IHOHA, HE-the Being-of-beings, the-self-sameness-of-the-sheltering-windings which-he-had-broken from Adam (the collective man) for (shaping) Aishah (the intellectual woman, man's faculty of volition), and-he-brought-her-to-Adam.

'69. Those-are the symbolical progenies of-Noah: Noah, intellectual-principle, right-proving-of-universal-accomplishments was-he, in-the-periods-his own: together with-him-the-Gods, he-applied-himself to walk, Noah.

'10:30. And-such-was the-restoring-place-of-them," from-harvest-spiritual-fruits, by-dint-of-spiritual-contriving, to-the-height-of-pristine-time.'

5. The Hutchinsonian school, founded by John Hutchinson (originally steward to the Duke of Somerset, and afterwards Master of Horse to George I.), who maintained that the Heb. SS. contain the true principles of philosophy and natural history; and that, as natural objects are representative of such as are spiritual and invisible, the Heb. words are to be explained in reference to these sublime objects. His principles pervade the lexicons of Bates and Parkhurst; but, though they have been embraced by several learned men in this country, they are now generally scouted, and have never been adopted, as far as we know, by any continental philologist. The disciples of this school are violent anti-punctuists.

6. The Cocceian, or polydynamic hypothesis, according to which the Heb. words are to be interpreted in every way consistent with their etymological import, or, as it has been expressed, in every sense of which they are capable. Its author, John Cocceius, a learned Dutch divine, regarded every thing in the O. T. as typical of Christ, or of his church and her enemies; and the lengths to which he carried his views on this subject considerably influenced the interpretations given in his Heb. Lexicon, which is, nevertheless, a work of no ordinary merit. This system has been recently followed by Mr. Von Meyer, of Frankfurt, in his improved version, with short notes.

7. The Schultensian school, by which, to a certain extent, a new epoch was formed in Heb. philology. Albert Schultens, prof. of oriental languages at Leyden, was enabled, by his profound knowledge of Arabic, to throw light on many obscure passages of Scripture, especially on Job; but, carrying his theory so far as to maintain that the only sure method of fixing the primitive significations of the Heb. words, is to determine the radical ideas attaching to the same words, or words made up of the same letters in Arabic, and then to transfer the meaning from the latter to the former, a wide door was opened for speculative and fanciful interpretation; and the greater number of the derivations proposed by this celebrated philologist and his admirers have been rejected as altogether untenable, by the first Heb. scholars, both in our own country and on the continent. The great faults of the system consisted in the disproportionate use of the Arabic, to the neglect of the other cognate dialects, especially the Syriac (which, being most closely related, ought to have the primary place); want of due attention to the context; an inordinate fondness for emphasis; and far-fetched etymological hypotheses and combinations.

8. The last school is that of Halle, so called from the German university of this name, where most of the Heb. scholars have received their education, or resided, by whom its distinguishing principles have been originated, and brought to their present advanced state of maturity. Its foundation was laid by J. H. and Ch. B. Michaelis, and the superstructure has been carried up by J. D. Michaelis, Simon, Eichhorn, Dindorf, Schnurrer, Rosenmüller, and Gesenius, who is allowed to be the first Hebraist of the present day.

(1) Its grand object is to combine all the different methods by which it is possible to arrive at a correct and indubitable knowledge of the Heb. language, as contained in the Scriptures of the O. T.;—allotting to each of the subsidiary means its relative value and authority, and proceeding, in the application of the whole, according to sober and well-matured principles of interpretation.

(2) The first of these means is the study of the language itself, as contained in the books of the O. T. Though by some carried to an unwarrantable length, it cannot admit of a doubt that this must ever form the grand basis of Scripture interpretation. Difficulties may be encountered at the commencement; but when, as we proceed, we find from the subject matter, from the design of the speaker or writer, and from other adjuncts, that the sense we have been taught to affix to the words must be the true one, we feel ourselves possessed of a key, which, as far as it goes, we may safely and confidently apply to unlock the sacred writings. When, however, the signification of a word cannot be determined by the simple study of the original Hebrew, recourse must then be had to the ancient versions, the authors of most of which, living near the time when the language was spoken in its purity, and being necessarily familiar with oriental scenes and customs, must be regarded as having furnished us with the most important and valuable of all the subsidiary means, by which to ascertain the sense in cases of hapax legomena (lit. once said), words or phrases of rare occurrence, or connections which throw no light on the meaning. Yet, in the use of these versions, care must be taken not to employ them exclusively, nor merely to consult one or two of them to the neglect of the rest. It must also be ascertained that their text is critically correct, in so far as the passage to be consulted is concerned; and the biblical student must not be satisfied with simply guessing at their meaning, or supposing that they either confirm or desert what he may have been led to regard as the sense of the original; but must be practically acquainted with the established usage obtaining in each version, and the particular character of their different renderings.

(3) The Rabbinical Lexicons and Commentaries furnish the next source; not, however, as a principium cognoscendi, or an infallible criterion: but, considering that the rabbins of the 10th, 11th, and 12th centuries, whose works alone are here taken into account, possessed a knowledge of the Arabic as their vernacular language, or in which, at least, they were well versed; that they were familiar with the traditional interpretation of the synagogue, as contained in the Talmud and other ancient Jewish writings; or transmitted through the medium of oral communication; and that they were mostly men of great learning, who rose superior to the trammels of tradition, and did not scruple to give their own views respecting the meaning of certain words and phrases, in opposition to the voice of antiquity,—a small degree of philological aid may reasonably be expected from their writings.

(4) The last mean consists in a proper use of the cognate dialects. These are the Chaldeic, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, Samaritan, Phœnician, and the Talmudical Hebrew. All these dialects possess, to a great extent, in common with the Heb., the same radical words, derivatives, mode of derivation, forms, grammatical structure, phrases, or modes of expression, and the same, or nearly the same, signification of words. They chiefly differ in regard to accentuation, the use of the vowels, the transmutation of consonants of the same class, the extent of signification in which certain words are used, and the peculiar appropriation of certain words, significations, and modes of speech, which are exhibited in one dialect to the exclusion of the rest.

(5) These languages, when judiciously applied, are useful in many ways. They confirm the precise signification of words, both radicals and derivatives, already ascertained or adopted from other sources. They discover many roots and primitives, the derivatives only of which occur in the Heb. Bible. They are of eminent service in helping to a knowledge of such words as occur but once, or, at least, but seldom, in the sacred writings; and they throw more light on the meaning of phrases, or idiomatical combinations of words—such combinations being natural to them all, as branches of the same stock, or to some of them a common, in consequence of certain more remote affinities.

(6) It is to the superiority the school of Halle has attained, in the combined application of these means, that we are indebted for the flood of light which has been poured upon the sacred pages.

SECTION II.

CRITICISM OF THE HEBREW TEXT.

Purity of the Sacred Text—Criticism of the Hebrew Bible—Labor of the Jewish Literati to preserve the Integrity of the Original Text—Early printed Editions of the Hebrew Bible—Influence of the Samaritan Pentateuch on the Hebrew Text—Critical Editions of Athias, Jablonski, Van der Hooght, Michaëlis, Houbigant, Kennicott, and De Rossi—Views of an Acquaintance with the Literary History of the Original Text—Celebrated Exemplars of the Hebrew Scriptures.

1. One of the first and highest objects of criticism is to ascertain and determine the purity or integrity of the text. Next to the genuineness and authenticity of the Scriptures, the purity of the text is obviously of the utmost importance. It will be plain to every mind, that the biblical books may have been originally written by divinely inspired persons; but that, during the lapse of ages, and by passing through various hands, they may have been so greatly corrupted as to have had their original character destroyed, and to have been rendered wholly unworthy of reception, as a revelation of the divine will and purpose. This topic, then, claims our first attention; and we shall therefore proceed to show the evidences we possess for establishing the identity of the text now extant with that delivered to the church by the inspired prophets, evangelists, and apostles.

1. With regard to the books of the O. T., it must be candidly admitted, that our knowledge of the formation of the present text is very imperfect and unsatisfactory. Dr. Kennicott contends that almost all the existing manuscripts were written between the years 1000 and 1460;* whence it has been reasonably inferred, that the older manuscripts were destroyed, after having been used by the Jewish literati, in revising the common text.

2. We know nothing of the method by which the revisors proceeded in the prosecution of their task, nor of the precise amount of those errors in the older copies that induced them to undertake its revision. But let it not be inferred from this admission, that the sacred text may therefore have been subjected to unauthorized alterations, or wilful corruptions. Did we possess no means of detecting such corruptions, if introduced (but which we do possess in abundance, in the ancient versions, quotations, &c.), the profound and almost superstitious veneration which even the most irreligious and immoral Jews are known to cherish for every title of their Scriptures, and the labor they have expended in preserving its purity, would alone assure us of the fact, that in their critical duties they were influenced by the most scrupulous integrity. Upon this subject it may be interesting, as well as satisfactory, to show the excess of care the Masorites bestowed in making their copies, with a view to the preservation of the integrity of the text. In transcribing the sacred writings, it has been a constant rule with them, that whatever is considered as corrupt, shall never be used, but shall be burnt, or otherwise destroyed. A book of the law, wanting but one letter, with one letter too much, or with an error in one single letter, written with any thing but ink, or written on parchment made of the hide of an unclean animal, or on parchment not purposely prepared for that use, or prepared by any but an Israelite, or on skins of parchment tied together by unclean strings, shall be held to be corrupt; that no word shall be written, without a line first drawn on the parchment; no word written by heart, or without having been first pronounced orally by the writer; that before he writes the name of God, he shall wash his pen; that no letter shall be joined to another; and that, if the blank parchment cannot be seen all around each letter, the roll shall be corrupt. There are settled rules for the length and breadth of each sheet, and for the space to be left before and after each letter, each word, and each section. These Maimonides mentions, as some of the principal rules to be observed in copying the sacred rolls. Even to this day, it is an obligation on the persons who copy the sacred writings to observe them; and those who have not seen the rolls used in the synagogues, can have no conception of the exquisite beauty, correctness, and equality of the writing.

3. But the attention of the Jews was not confined to the permanence of the Holy Word; they also made incredible exertions to preserve the genuineness and integrity of the text. This produced what is termed the Masora, which has been justly pronounced to be the most stupendous monument in the whole history of literature, of minute and persevering labor. The persons who were employed in it, and who afterwards received from it the name of Masorites, were some Jewish literati, who flourished after the commencement of the Christian era. With a reverential, not to say superstitious, attention, of which history does not furnish an instance to be urged in comparison with it, they counted all the verses, words, and letters of all the 24 books of the O. T., and of each of those 24 books, and of every section of each book, and of all the subdivisions of each section. They distinguished the verses where they thought there was something forgotten; the words which they believed to be changed; the letters which they thought superfluous; the repetitions of the same verses; the different reading of the words which are redundant or defective; the number of times that the same word is found in the beginning, middle, or end of a verse; the different significations of the same word; the agreement or conjunction of one word with another; the number of words that are printed above; which letters are pronounced, and which are turned upside down; and such as hang perpendicular: all these enumerations they made, and took the number of each. Such was their scrupulosity, that though it might have been plain that one letter was put for another, or that a word was pushed out of its place, still they would not vary the text, but indicated these changes by a particular mark, supposing that some mystery had occasioned the alteration. They distinguished the degrees of certainty which they attributed to their critical corrections or insinuations by three words: KERI, read;—CHETIB, write;—and SBHIR, conjecture.†

4. Such critics were not likely capriciously or wilfully to alter the text; and their numerous and minute rules rendered it almost impossible that they should do so by accident, at least in any thing very material.

II. But we are as much at a loss to ascertain the rules adopted by the early editors of the printed editions. The particular MSS. they used, the way they employed their materials, the degree of authority they yielded to preceding editions, and other similar matters, are all beyond our power to learn; for on those points they have maintained a complete silence. We must, therefore, be contented with a brief sketch of the principal editions, and then notice the process by which our present critical apparatus has been formed.

1. The first printed edition of the entire Heb. Bible was that executed at Soncino, in 1488, under the editorial care of Abraham ben Chayim. Its critical value is very great, but there are only 9 copies of it known to be in existence: the Bodleian library, and that of Exeter College, Oxford, possess the only two in England. The variations between this edition and that of Van der Hooght amount (so Kennicott) to some thousands, though none are of any great moment.

2. This was followed, in 1494, by an edition at Brescia, edited by Gerson, son of Rabbi Moses, which deserves special attention, from having been used by Luther for his German translation, and also from having formed the basis of several subsequent editions, of which may be noticed that in the Complutensian Polyglot.

3. These two editions, with a third, printed in 1517, without the name of any place, are called the Soncinates, being printed by Jew. of a family originally from Germany, established at Soncino, in Lombardy, between Cremona and Brescia. They were the first Heb. printers.‡

4. We need only further mention that by Daniel Bomberg, in 1525, at Venice. This, the Brescia edition of 1494, and the Complutensian edition of 1517, form the basis of most subsequent editions.

III. But whatever variations may be found in the text of these and subsequent early editions of the Heb. Scriptures, it must not be supposed that they resulted from any deviation on the part of the respective editors from the MSS. they employed. Christians, as well as the Jews, confided most implicitly in the immaculate purity of the text; to have questioned which would have been regarded as an act of the utmost temerity, if not of impiety. Hence it is not to be wondered at, that Buxtorf, who published his Tiberias, or an exposition and defence of the Masoretic doctrines, in 1620, should confirm the affirmation of Elias Levita, by saying of the Heb. MSS., Omnium librorum, qui vel in Asia, vel in Africa, vel in Europa sunt, sine ulla discrepantia, consonans harmonia cernitur. It so happened, however, that in the early part of the 17th century, the Sam. copy of the Pentateuch, the existence of which was well known to some of the early Christian writers, but which had been lost sight of for upwards of a thousand years, was again brought to light; and its numerous variations from the Masoretic text suggested the idea of a diversity of readings in the Heb. MSS. The examination of copies hence induced, issued in the detection of actual and numerous mistakes, and thus prepared the way for that corrected and purer text we now possess.

1. The first person who boldly and determinately impeached the purity of the Heb. text was the learned Morinus, a Roman Catholic priest, of the Oratory at Paris, who first published his Exercitationes Ecclesiasticæ et Biblicæ, in 1633. In 1650, he was followed by the erudite Capellus, in the same country, and, in 1658, by our own celebrated and justly venerated countryman, Bp. Walton. The Critica Sacra of Capellus should not be passed over without notice. This elaborate production, the work of 36 years of the industrious author's life, Capellus could not get printed in the Protestant states; but at length, through the influence of Morinus and other Catholics, it was printed, by royal license, at Paris, under the care of his son. The integrity or purity of the Heb. text was here assailed at great length, and with nearly as much success as he had formerly evinced in attacking the divine origin of the points. He contended that verbal mistakes had crept into the Heb. SS., as into all ancient authors; that the printed editions were not always correct, and did not always agree with each other; and that the ancient versions might be properly employed as one means of correcting the text. In six books, he established the existence of various readings. (I.) From the juxtaposition of different parts of the O. T. (II.) From a collation of the parallel passages of the O. and N. T. (III.) From collations of the Masora, the Sam., and the most ancient printed editions of the SS. (IV.) From a collation of the Sept. with the Heb. text. (V.) From a comparison of the Heb. text with the Chal. paraphrase, the Greek versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, the Latin Vulgate, and the rabbinical commentators. In Book VI. he treats of the errors of transcribers, and of conjectural emendations.

2. The labors of these critics having destroyed the confidence hitherto reposed in the integrity* of the Heb. text, originated an inquiry respecting the means for ascertaining the extent to which it had suffered, and the sources for restoring its purity. It seems not to have occurred to these learned men, however, that a collation of MSS. would furnish the most satisfactory evidence of the actual state of the text, as well as the materials for its improvement. The only standards by which Morinus had thought of measuring it, were the Sam. Pentateuch, and the Sept. or ancient Greek version: wherever it differed from these, he concluded that its verity was impaired. Nor was the critical apparatus of Capellus much more extensive, as is evident from the account just given of his work; although he avoided many of the errors into which his predecessors had fallen, by exercising a sounder judgment as to the criterion of purity. He considered the ancient versions, when applied under proper restrictions, as one source of critical authority in ascertaining the purity of disputed passages; but he did not consider, with Morinus, that a deviation of the Heb. from the Sept. or from the Vulg. was a reason for supposing that, in such places, the Heb. was incorrect. In short, his principles of criticism were such as the best judges have applied to ancient authors in general. Where Capellus failed, he failed in the application of his principles.[†]

* De Rossi divides Heb. MSS. into (1) More ancient, written before the 13th cent.; (2) Ancient, in the 13th and 14th cents.; (3) More recent, at the end of the 14th or the beginning of the 15th century.

† See Lewis's Origines Heb. vol. iv. p. 156; Calmet's Dict. vol. ii. p. 122, 5th ed.; Butler's Horn Bib. p. 40.

3. Attention having been thus excited to the subject, it was soon determined that the only satisfactory mode of proceeding was by a collation of MSS. and ancient versions. This was accordingly undertaken by competent persons, who gave the result in the successive editions of Athias, Jablonski, Van der Hooght, Michaelis, and Houbigant. It was reserved for the indefatigable Kennicott, however, to institute an extensive collation of MSS., and to produce the first critical edition of the Heb. Bible upon a magnificent scale. During the 30 years in which he and his coadjutors were employed in this work, under the patronage of the learned and wealthy in all parts of Europe, upwards of 600 Heb. MSS. and 16 copies of the Sam. Pentateuch were either wholly or partially collated. Nor was this the full extent of his labors. Ardently desirous of giving consistency and permanency to the text, this industrious scholar added to the collation of MSS. a collation of the most valuable printed editions, and an examination of the quotations from the Heb. Bible which were found in the works of the Jewish literati. The first vol. of Kennicott's Bible was published in 1776; the second, in 1780.

4. 'That the mass of various readings exhibited in this edition, which greatly exceed in number the various readings collected by the industry of three centuries for the Greek Testament, contains but few of real importance, is no subject of reproach to the learned editor,' says Bp. Marsh, 'who could only produce what his authorities afforded. Nor is he to be censured for giving all he had, without regard to their relative value. His was the first attempt to give a copious collection of Hebrew readings; and he could hardly have been justified, had he exercised his own discretion in regard to the portion which should be laid before the public. He wisely, therefore, afforded the opportunity to his readers of selecting for themselves; and though his extracts are rarely of much value for critical emendation, they enable us, both to estimate the existing Heb. MSS., and to draw some important conclusions as to the integrity of the Heb. text.'

5. The major part of this immense collection of readings consists in mere variations of orthography, in the fulness or defectiveness of certain words, in the addition or subtraction of a mater lectionis; of a vau, or a yod. And if we further deduct the readings which are either manifest errors, or in other respects of no value, the important deviations will be confined within a very narrow compass. In short, Dr. Kennicott's collation has contributed to establish the credit of the Masora. We learn from it this useful lesson, that, although a multiplication of written copies will, notwithstanding all human endeavors, produce variations in the text, the MSS. of the Heb. Bible have been so far protected by the operation of the Masora, that all now extant, both the oldest and the newest, might be compared with those MSS. of the Greek Testament which Griesbach refers to the same edition.[§]

6. A few years after the publication of Dr. Kennicott's Bible, Dr. Rossi, the Heb. professor at Parma, and the friend and fellow-laborer of Kennicott, added considerably to the collections previously made, by publishing the various readings of 731 MSS., and 310 editions, some of which were unknown, and others but little known. The whole number of MSS. collated, on this occasion, therefore, amounted to 1346; and of editions, to 352; making a total of 1698; containing several hundred thousand various readings. And yet not one doctrine or precept of revelation is affected by them.

7. One circumstance connected with this undertaking is worthy of note; namely, the proof thereby afforded, that the marginal words of the Masora, printed opposite to the text in the rabbinical Bibles, and hitherto regarded as materials of interpretation, transmitted by oral tradition from the sacred writers, are in fact nothing more than various readings of the Heb. text. Out of a thousand of them, as printed by Van der Hooght, there were but fourteen not found in the text of some one of the MSS. examined by Kennicott.

IV. Such is the history of the Heb. text; from which the progress hitherto made in its criticism may in some measure be gathered. The necessity for this review may not at present be apparent; but, as sacred criticism has for its object an aggregate of literary labors, undertaken at different periods, and for different purposes; and as its principles are general conclusions deduced from these literary labors, it will ultimately be seen, that the reason or foundation of those laws cannot be comprehended without a previous knowledge of the nature and amount of these labors. By such a review we discover not only the means by which it has acquired its present form, but also the propriety of the rules critics have laid down for directing and regulating their operations.^{||}

V. This section may close with a brief notice of those celebrated copies of the Heb. Scriptures which have been adopted by the Jews as exemplars of all subsequent copies.

1. The copy of HILLEL, who is thought to have lived about the year A. D. 100, was preserved at Toledo, in Spain, where Kimchi, who lived in the 12th century, states that he saw it. Rabbi Zacuti, who lived near the close of the 15th century, says that part of it had been sent into Africa.

2. The copy of AARON BEN ASHER, one of the doctors of the celebrated academy at Tiberias, about the middle of the 11th century, was preserved for many years at Jerusalem as a standard copy; and Maimonides, who made his own copy of the law from it, assures us that it was universally appealed to. From this exemplar all the MSS. of the Western Jews, as well as all the printed copies of the Heb. Bible, are almost wholly derived.

3. The copy of JACOB BEN NAFTALI, who was president of the other famous Jewish academy at Babylon, and contemporary with BEN ASHER, was adopted by the Oriental Jews.

4. The Codices of JERICHO and SINAI, and one called SANBOUKI, are highly commended for their accuracy.

5. The CODEX MALABARICUS, obtained by the late Dr. Buchanan from the black Jews in Malabar, whence its name, though forming a distinct class, should not be passed by without notice. [The cut is a fac-simile

אֲתֵכֶם נִתְּנָה לָכֶם לֹא תִתְּנוּ עַל הַדָּבָר אֲשֶׁר

of a line of this MS. from Horne.—Ed.] It is evident, as Bp. Marsh suggests, that the copies of the Pentateuch preserved in India must have descended from the autograph of Moses through very different channels to those in the W. of Europe, and therefore the close agreement of the one with the other (the Indian copy presenting only four peculiar readings) is proof that they have preserved the original text in great purity. Whether this copy was formed from the Masoretic text, is by no means certain; for although, perhaps, written much later than the period when the Masorites finished their labors, it is probable their influence never reached the mountainous district in the S. of India.[¶]

SECTION III.

EARLY VERSIONS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

The Samaritan Pentateuch—The Septuagint—Greek Versions of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus—Labors of Origen—Value of the Sept. to an Interpreter—Relationship between the Sam. Pentateuch and the LXX.—Early Revision of the Heb. Text—Value of Various Readings.

I. Mention has been made of the SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH, in reference to its influence on the criticism of the Heb. Scriptures; but before we proceed to the Greek Testament, some further account of this venerable work, and also of the SEPTUAGINT Version is called for.

1. The existence of the PENTATEUCH, or five Books of Moses, written in the peculiar alphabetic character employed by the Samaritans, was known in very ancient times to such of the Christian Fathers as were acquainted with Heb. Origen, on Num. 13:1, and 21:13, distinctly speaks of it; as does Jerome, in his prologue to Kings, and other places.

2. These, with one or two similar references in Origen, constitute the evidence we have, that the Sam. Pentateuch was known in very ancient times to such of the Fathers as devoted themselves to the critical study of the Hebrew Scriptures. From the time of Jerome down to the first quarter of the 17th century, however, no traces appear in the history of criticism and sacred literature, of the existence of the Samaritan copy of the law of Moses. In the year 1616, Petrus à Valle bought of the Samaritans at Damascus, a complete copy, which was sent, in 1623, by A. H. de Sancy, to the library of the Oratory at Paris. J. Morinus briefly described this copy, not long afterwards, in the preface to his edition of the Septuagint, A. D. 1628. Soon after he published his 'Exercitationes Ecclesiasticæ in utrumque Samaritanorum Pentateuchum,' in which he extols very highly the text of the Sam. Pentateuch, preferring it above the common Heb. text. About the same time, from the copy purchased by à Valle, Morinus printed the Sam. text of the Paris Polyglot; and from this, Walton printed the Sam. text in the London Polyglot, with very few corrections.

* The text of an ancient author may be said to have preserved its integrity, if it is, upon the whole, such as when it left his hands. Here, however, the term is used in a higher sense, as denoting its purity, or freedom from all error.

† Bishop Marsh's Lectures, p. 210.

‡ The letters (א) aleph, (ב) bet, and (ג) yod, are called mater lectionis, because employed to assist the reader of an unpointed MS. how to pronounce the words which contain these letters, being considered chiefly as prope

to those points which usually accompany them. Where MSS. are pointed, they are inserted, or omitted, at the discretion of the writer.

 For some account of these, see pt. iii. ch. 3, § 1.

3. In the mean time, between the years 1630 and 1630, Abp. Usher, so distinguished for his zeal in sacred literature, as well as for the knowledge of it which he himself acquired, had succeeded, by persevering efforts, in obtaining six additional copies of the Sam. Pentateuch from the East, some complete, others incomplete. Five of these are still in England, deposited in different libraries; one, which the archbishop presented to L. de Dieu, appears to have been lost.

4. In 1621, another copy was sent to Italy, which is now in the Ambrosian library at Milan. About the same time, Peirese procured three copies; two of which are in the royal library at Paris, and one in that of Barberini at Rome.

5. To these copies others have since been added; so that Kennicott was able to extend the comparison of Sam. MSS., for his critical collection of various readings, to the number of sixteen: most, however, were more or less defective.

6. The external appearance of these MSS.

It is a small folio in size, and consists of 254 pages, written on vellum. It is in an excellent state of preservation.

8. The MSS. differ, however, in some unimportant particulars. Words of doubtful construction are sometimes marked by a small line over one of the letters. The margin is empty, unless, as is sometimes the case, the Samaritan or Arabic version is placed by the side of the original text. The whole Pentateuch, like the Jewish copy, is divided into paragraphs, which they call Katrin. But while the Jews make only 52 or 54 divisions (one to be read on each Sabbath in the year), the Samaritans make 966.

9. The age of some of the Sam. copies is determined by the date, which accompanies the name of the copyist; in others it is not found. Kennicott has endeavored to ascertain the date of all the Sam. MSS. which he compared. But he resorts to conjecture, supported by no well-grounded rules of judging. The Codex Oratorii, used by Morinus, he supposes to have been copied in the 11th century; while all the others, except one, are conceded to be of more recent origin. One he assigns to the 8th century. The reasoning of Kennicott and De Rossi, about the age of Heb. and Sam. MSS., rests, however, on very uncertain grounds.

10. The Sam. MSS. are written either on parchment or silk paper. Ordinary paper has been used, in recent times, only to supply some defects.

11. The Christian world, before Morinus published his famous 'Exercit. Eccles. in utrumque Sam. Pentat.' (1631), had been accustomed, as we have seen, to resort only to the Jewish Heb. Scriptures, as exhibiting the well-authenticated and established text of the Mosaic law. But the publication of Morinus soon excited a controversy, which, even at the present time, has not wholly subsided. As the Sam. copy of the law, in a multitude of places, agrees with the version of the Seventy, Morinus maintained that the authority of the Sam., particularly when supported by the Sept., was paramount to that of the Jewish text. He labored, moreover, to show that, in a multitude of passages, which, in that text, as it now stands, are obscure and difficult, or unharmonious, the Sam. offers the better reading; that the Jews have corrupted their Scriptures by negligence, or ignorance, or superstition; and that the safe and only way to purify them, is to correct them from the Sam. in connection with the Sept.

12. The signal was now given for the great contest which ensued. Capellus, in his 'Critica Sacra,' followed in the steps of Morinus; but De Muis, Hottinger, Stephen agrees, in some respects, with that of the synagogue rolls of the Jews; but in many others it differs. All the Samaritan copies in Europe are in the form of books, either folio, quarto, or still smaller; although the Samaritans, in their synagogues, make use of rolls, as the Jews do also. The letters in the Samaritan copies are simple, exhibiting nothing like the literæ majusculæ, minusculæ, inversæ, suspensæ, &c. of the Hebrews. They are entirely destitute of vowel points, accents, or diacritical signs, such as are found in Heb. and Chald. Each word is separated from the one which follows it by a point placed between them; parts of sentences are distinguished by two points; and periods and paragraphs by short lines, or lines and points.

7. The following is a fac-simile of the first line of the MS. preserved in the British Museum (Bibl. Cotton, Claudius. B. 8.), which was one of the six copies belonging to Abp. Usher, and by him presented to Sir R. Cotton.

from parallel passages, or where apparent defects are supplied from them. (5) Additions or repetitions respecting things said and done; drawn from the preceding context, and again recorded, so as to make the readings in question. (6) Such corrections as were made to remove what was offensive in respect to sentiment; i. e. which conveyed views, or narrated facts, deemed improbable by the correctors. (7) Where the pure Heb. idiom is exchanged for the Sam. (8) Where alterations have been made so as to produce conformity to the Sam. theology, worship, or mode of interpretation.

17. Gesenius has produced a multitude of examples, almost to satiety, for the purpose of removing all rational doubt as to the positions he advances. Only four various readings in the whole Sam. Pentat. are considered by him as preferable, perhaps, to the Heb. text. These are the well-known passages in Gen. 4.6. 22:13. 49:14. 14:14. Many critics, however, who will acquiesce in the general conclusion of Gesenius, will, it is apprehended, differ from him as to the precise number of such passages.

18. The result of Gesenius's labors has been, then, to ruin the credit of the Sam. Pentat. as an authentic source of correcting the Heb. records; a result of no small importance, considering the thousands of places in which it differs from the Heb., and the excessive value which has been set upon it by critics of great note, in different parts of Europe.

19. As to the age of the Sam. Codex, Gesenius regards that time as the most probable from which to date its origin, when Manasseh, the son-in-law of Sanballat, the Samaritan governor, and brother of the high-priest at Jerusalem, went over to the Samaritans, built a temple on Mount Gerizim, by the aid of his father-in-law, and instituted the Mosaic worship there. Many of the peculiar readings of the Sam. Codex, he thinks, can be accounted for by such a supposition, and, at all events, we must suppose that Manasseh carried a copy of the Jewish law along with him. But an able writer in the North American Review assigns to this codex, upon what appear to be indisputable grounds, a much earlier date, carrying it up to the time of Jeroboam's reign over the ten tribes. This is, indeed, the only hypothesis which gets rid of the difficulties connected with the supposed origin of the Sam. Codex.

20. This Pentateuch, although written in the Sam. character, is in the Heb. language, like the Pentateuch in our Heb. Bibles. There is, however, a translation of the Heb. Sam. Pentateuch into the proper Sam. dialect, a medium between the Heb. and Aramaean languages, which is thought to have been made as early as the close of the first century. There is also a version by Abusaid, in the 11th or 12th century, into the Samaritan Arabic dialect; i. e. the Arabic as spoken by the Samaritans. There are also a few scattered remains of an ancient Greek version, made from the Sam. Pentat., some of which have been collected by Morinus, Hottinger, and Montfaucon; but they are too scanty to be of much critical value.

II. The SEPTUAGINT version of the O. T. is the most ancient and valuable of all the translations of the sacred books; but there is scarcely a subject of sacred literature upon which more has been written, or of which less, with any degree of certainty, is known. The most ancient account of it is written in Greek by Aristæus, who states himself to have been an officer in the guards of Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, at the time it was made. The following is the substance of his narrative:

1. Ptolemy Philadelphus, wishing to establish an extensive library at Alexandria, committed the charge of it to Demetrius Phalerus, a noble Athenian, who collected from various quarters 20,000 volumes. In the course of his inquiries after curious and valuable books, he was informed of the Law of Moses, in the Heb. language, and urged to the king the importance of a translation of it into Greek. Ptolemy directed an embassy to Eleazar, the high-priest at Jerusalem, to request a correct copy of the law, and grave and learned men, capable of translating it out of Hebrew into Greek. Aristaeas, Sosibius, and Andreas, three noblemen of Ptolemy's court, friendly to the Jews, embraced the opportunity for soliciting the liberation of the Jewish captives, taken prisoners by Ptolemy Soter, and still detained in slavery. Their suit was successful, and the king ordered 20 drachmas to be paid to their possessors for each of them, whether man, woman, or child. The sum expended in their ransom was 660 talents, liberating 198,000 captives. Aristaeas and Andreas were afterwards commissioned to carry the official letter from Ptolemy to Eleazar, and their embassy was accompanied with gifts for the temple, and money for the sacrifices there offered, and the general service of the sanctuary; viz., 100 talents; 50 talents in utensils of gold, and 20 talents in utensils of silver, beside the precious stones with which they were adorned, of twice their value. Their embassy succeeded, and Eleazar sent to the Egyptian king a copy of the law, written in letters of gold, upon skins of parchment of exquisite fineness and beauty. Six elders out of every tribe, men of acknowledged reputation and learning, were chosen to execute the translation, who returned to Alexandria with the messengers of Ptolemy. On their arrival, the 72 elders were graciously received by the king, who not only expressed his satisfaction at receiving the law, and his astonishment at its execution, but also feasted the elders for several days; and during the festival, fully satisfied himself of their wisdom and ability, by proving each of them by 72 different questions. The seven days of feasting being ended, each of the elders received three talents, as a mark of the royal favor, and was then conducted by Demetrius to a sumptuous habitation, prepared for them in a retired situation in the isle of Pharos, near Alexandria. Here they pursued their important undertaking with the utmost diligence, daily collating their separate versions with each other, and then dictating the approved version to Demetrius, who acted as their scribe. In 72 days they completed the whole translation, which was afterwards read in the presence of the king, who expressed his approbation in the most decided manner, and rewarded each elder with three rich garments, two talents of gold, and a cup of gold weighing one talent. He afterwards sent them honorably back to Jerusalem, loaded with the most valuable gifts to Eleazar the high-priest; and commanded the version itself to be lodged with the utmost care in the Alexandrian library.

2. This account was, in the main, adopted by the Christian Fathers, some of whom contributed additional circumstances; but it is now, however, generally exploded. That Demetrius Philaleus was ever librarian to Ptolemy Philadelphus is extremely doubtful, and it is by no means to be reconciled with the well-known facts in his life. Besides, it is very unlikely that a Peripatetic philosopher, of Demetrius's character, should have paid so much respect to the books of the Jews, as to request such an exertion of the royal authority as this account attributes to him. The prevailing opinion now is, that the Sept. translation was made at Alexandria, at different times, and by different interpreters. That it was not all the work of the same translator or translators, is manifest from the very great diversity of style, and the various modes of translating, that prevail in it. The Pentateuch, which is the most accurate part of the entire work, was probably executed in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, by some learned Jews, for the use of their brethren then resident in Egypt, and who used the Greek language; and the remaining books, at different times, and the necessity of the case demanded, or the providence of God permitted.* It is thought, that when the Alexandrian Jews found this public exposure of their sacred oracles, or their translation into a profane language, to be displeasing to their brethren in Palestine, they invented the Aristean story, to give their version the sanction of royal authority.

3. The two most noted MSS. of the Sept. are the Codex Alexandrinus and the Codex Vaticanus.

(1) The Codex Alexandrinus, or Alexandrian copy, is now in the British Museum, and was presented to King Charles I. by Cyrilus Lucaris, patriarch of Constantinople, who obtained it at Alexandria, where it is thought to have been penned. It is in uncial or capital letters, without accents or marks of aspiration. A fac-simile of the N. T. has been published by Dr. Woide; and a fac-simile of the O. T. has also been completed, under Rev. H. H. Baber. The following is a specimen of this precious MS., Ps. i:1, in part.

The date of this MS. has been strongly they could obtain no knowledge of their Scriptures but through the medium of a translation; and therefore, to supply the place of the Sept., a new Greek version was made, about the year 129, by Aquila of Pontus, first a convert from paganism to Christianity, and then a proselyte to Judaism. His version, which is now lost, is reported to have been very obscure. Of course another was called for, and that of Theodotion made its appearance about the year 184. This translator, who had been a disciple of Tatian, then a Marcionite, and lastly a Jew, retained as much of the Sept. version as suited his purpose, but altered, added to, or retrenched, to make it conform to such Heb. MSS. as the Jews put into his hands. The Jews, it might be expected, were well pleased with this version; and the Christians were not offended, because it so much resembled the Sept.

IV. Towards the end of the same century, or early in the next, appeared another Greek translation, less literal, and much more elegant than either of the former. It was the work of Symmachus; who, according to Eusebius, was first a Jew, then a Christian, and lastly an Ebionite. In this last communion, and for the use of its members, he composed his work, which he afterwards seems to have remodelled, in a second edition. The version of Symmachus is often and deservedly praised by Eusebius and Jerome; and the latter is thought to have made it, in a great measure, the pattern of his Latin translation.

V. Besides these, there are three other Greek versions mentioned by the early Christian writers, called the fifth, sixth, and seventh; because their respective authors or editors are unknown. They seem to have comprehended only, or chiefly, the poetical books. Whether made by Jews or Christians, it is difficult to say. Dr. Geddes thinks the sixth, which bears strong marks of Christian extraction, was only an interpolated edition of the Sept.

VI. All these versions were collected by the indefatigable Origen, and placed, together with the Sept. and original Heb. text, in his famous Polyptia; and this, perhaps, is the last entire copy of them ever made: for the Talmudists having gradually excluded all Gr. vers. from the synagogues, and the Christians universally adhering to the old translation, the rest were either totally neglected, or only such parts copied into the margins of Bibles and commentaries, as were deemed most worth attention.†

1. Thus the Sept. version triumphed, in length, and remained, for several ages after, the sole Scripture standard in all the Christian churches.

2. We are not to imagine, however, that it was exactly the same in every church, or that any church possessed a perfectly correct copy of it; much less, that any such copy now exists. It had contracted many blemishes in the days of Origen; and it was principally with a view to remove them, that he designed and executed the most celebrated of his works. No man, says Geddes, could be better qualified for such an undertaking; to a strong constitution, a clear head, and a most prodigious memory, he had joined an immense and universal erudition, by the most assiduous and incessant application that, perhaps, ever was made. His insatiable thirst for learning made him pry into every corner for rare and curious books; and the liberality of his rich friends put it in his power to purchase them.

3. With all these advantages, he began, about the year 231, to compile his Tetrapla, which contained, in so many separate columns, and in the following order, the four

ⲁⲙⲁⲣⲓⲟⲥⲁⲛⲏⲣⲟⲥⲟⲩⲕⲉⲧⲧⲟⲩⲉⲩ
ⲑⲏⲉⲛⲃⲟⲩⲁⲕⲉⲃⲱⲛ

contested by biblical critics; some referring it to the middle of the 4th century, others contending it could not have been executed earlier than the 10th.‡

(2) The Codex Vaticanus, so called because preserved in the library of the Vatican at Rome, is a most valuable MS., and is greatly preferred by some critics to the Codex Alexandrinus. It is written in the uncial or capital letters, and originally contained the entire Bible, but is now imperfect in both Testaments. It is supposed to have been written some time in the 4th century, before the time of Jerome; though some refer it to the 6th or 7th century.†

4. Although the Sept. version was originally made for the use of the Egyptian Jews, it at length acquired so high a degree of authority among the Jews of Palestine, who understood the Greek language, that, for a time, it was read in their synagogues instead of the Heb.; and it is in very many passages quoted by the inspired writers of the N. T. It was early translated into Latin, and became the text-book of the Westerns, as well as of the Eastern churches. It was the only copy of the O. T. Scriptures they generally used, or appealed to in all their controversies, particularly with the Jews, employing it most advantageously in confuting those from whom they had received it; proving to them from it, by the most irrefragable arguments, that their expected Messiah must have already come, in the person of Jesus Christ. This circumstance at length led the Jews to have it in abhorrence, and a national annual fast was instituted to deplore the same event which they had before commemorated by a solemn festival; so that, by the end of the first century, it was expelled from every synagogue.

III. The Heb., however, had become so completely a dead language, not only to the Hellenists, but to the Jews generally, that uniformly exact version. The tr. of Ecclesiastes understood Greek better than Heb.; the tr. of Amos was the best of all; of Ezekiel, very learned—they often abridge rather than translate; as in Est., and in many places of the Prophets.—See Dr. Fye Smith's Scripture Testimony to the Messiah, vol. i. pp. 398, 399.

† Hug has a good account of this MS. in Introd. N. T., vol. i. p. 267, sq. Dr. Wall's tr.

‡ Ibid. p. 262, et seq.

§ Of such fragments Montfaucon composed his Hexapla, 2 vols. fol.

* The learned Hugh Broughton thought he discovered, in the larger books of the Sept., internal marks of a change in the translator at the close of portions, averaging each about 14 chapters of the present division. "They were not all," he says, "equally competent. The translators of the Pentateuch have shown much ability, though he who rendered the words of God to Cain (Gen. 4:7) either intentionally concealed their meaning, or was a mere child in Hebrew. The trs. of the historical books, Ps., and Ps., were very able. The translator of Job was a reader of the Greek poets, and more careful to employ classical idioms, than to produce a Greek versions of Aquila, Symmachus, the Septuagint, and Theodotion.

1. But the very considerable differences, which Origen could not but observe, between the Sept. and the three other versions, so recently made from the originals, and so nearly agreeing with one another, induced him to suspect it to be much more erroneous than he had formerly thought; and suggested the idea of a work which should, both by its magnitude and importance, totally eclipse the former one. This produced, in succession, the Hexapla, Octapla, and Enneapla; so denominated from the number of columns each contained. In the Enneapla, of 9 columns, the 3 last contained the 3 anonymous Gr. versions before mentioned; the 4 immediately preceding them were the same with those of the Tetrapla; and in the first 2 stood the original Heb. letters, with the pronunciation by its side in Gr. characters.

5. Here it would have been well had the biblical labors of this indefatigable critic terminated; but his judgment was not commensurate with his learning. He now determined upon a revision of the Sept., to make it more conformable to the Heb. text. The materials he employed are now utterly unknown; nor is it possible to say in how many respects his revised text differs from the older copies, which have long since been destroyed. But for this evil, to its full extent, Origen himself must not bear the blame. The text itself he left untouched; and only pointed out, by certain marks, the differences between that and the Heb. text with which he had collated it. His admirers and followers, however, altered the old text, according to his suggestions, in the copies they made; and the loss of the autograph renders it impossible to ascertain how much. From this revised text all our present copies of the Sept. are derived.

VII. As a source of interpretation for the N. T. the Sept. is invaluable. Desirous of possessing in Greek a faithful representation of the Heb. Scriptures, and being themselves Jews, the translators retained Heb. forms and modes of expression, while the words they were writing were Greek. The language, therefore, of the Sept. is a kind of Hebrew-Greek, which a native of Athens might sometimes have found difficult to understand. But, as this version became the Bible of all the Jews dispersed throughout the countries where Greek was spoken, it became the standard of their Greek language. Paul himself, who was born in Tarsus, and accustoming from his childhood to hear the Sept. read in the synagogue of that city, adopted its Hebrewisms. And when removed to Jerusalem, and placed under the guidance of Gamaliel, the Heb. structure of his Greek could have suffered no diminution. The other apostles were all natives of Palestine; as was the Evangelist Mark, and probably, also, the Evangelist Luke. Their language, therefore, was Syriac, or Aramaean, of which the terms of expression had a close correspondence with those of the ancient Heb. Consequently, when they wrote in Greek, their language could not fail to resemble the language used by the Greek trs.; and as every Jew, who read Greek at all (which they who wrote in it must have done), would read the Greek Bible, the style of the Sept. again operated in forming the style of the Greek Testament. Both the Heb. Bible, therefore, and the Greek Test. are so closely connected with the Sept., as well in their language as in their matter, that the Sept. is a source of interpretation alike important to both.*

2. An account of the various editions of the Sept. will not be expected here; but it would be unpardonable to omit noticing the valuable and splendid edition from the Clarendon press, at Oxford, commenced by the late Dr. Holmes, and since completed by Mr. Parsons. It contains the various readings of all the MSS. and editions that could be procured throughout Europe, or preserved in quotations by early Christian writers. It is every way worthy to accompany the Heb. labors of Kennicott and De Rossi; and only wants some future Griesbach to estimate the comparative claims of those readings to genuineness — an arduous task, on account of the intermixture of the other versions with that of the Seventy.†

VIII. A highly interesting circumstance relating to the Sam. Pentat. and Sept., and affecting their critical character and value, remains to be noticed.

1. It is well known, that although, considered in a general point of view, the Pentateuch in the Sept. is a good version of the original, it nevertheless departs in very many cases from the exactness of the Heb. text. In regard to these departures, it is a very interesting circumstance that in more than a thousand cases of them, the Sept. and the Sam. Pent. are harmonious, both differing from the Heb. and agreeing in their differences. In most of these cases, the discrepancies with the original Heb. are peculiar to the Sam. and Sept. codices, the ancient versions being only now and then accordant with them. The departures from the Heb. in the Sept. and Sam. are thus classified by Gesenius.

(1) Those which are mere glosses, or conjectural emendations of difficult passages; as Ge. 2.2, 24. 14:19.

(2) Very minute changes, not affecting the sense, and depending on the omission, transposition, or permutation of letters, &c. For example, vau prefix is added to the text, in the Sam., about 200 times where it is not found in the Heb. copy, and removed about 100 times where it is found in the Heb.; in nearly all of which cases, it is closely followed by the Sept. On the other hand,

(3) The Sept. agrees with the Heb. in cases like No. 2, in almost a thousand instances, where the Samaritan differs from both: for example, Ge. 17:17. 21:2, 4. 24:55. 41:32, &c.

(4) Both the Sam. and the Sept. sometimes depart from the Heb. in laboring to remove difficulties; but they pursue different courses in order to accomplish this: for example, Ge. 27:40. Ex. 24:10, 11. and the genealogies Ge. 5:11.

(5) The Sept. accords with the Heb. and differs from the Sam. in all those daring interpolations mentioned under the 8th class of various readings, in the former part of this section.

(6) The Sept. differs from the Heb. and Sam. both, in a few cases of minor importance, from permutation of letters, &c., or introduction of parallel passages.

2. Castell has displayed all these discrepancies in the 6th vol. of Walton's Polyglot, p. 19, seq. In most cases, in which the Sept. and Sam. agree, when they differ from the Heb., it is perfectly plain that this could not have been the result of any concerted regular plan of alteration, such as we see in the Sam. and Sept. in respect to the chronologies in Ge. 5:11. Most of the discrepancies are entirely of an immaterial nature, not at all affecting the sentiment of the sacred text.

3. Such are the facts: to account for them is difficult, and demands a good degree of acquaintance with the business of criticism. Three ways have been proposed, to explain such a surprising accordance of the Sept.

and Sam. in so great a number of cases, against the Heb.

(1) The Seventy translated from a Sam. codex. So De Dieu, Selden, Hottinger, Hassencamp, Eichhorn, and others. But this is altogether improbable. The mortal hatred which existed between the Jews and Samaritans in Palestine, at the time when the version of the Seventy was made, extended in the same manner to the Jews and Samaritans in Egypt. Josephus tells us that in the time of the Ptolemies (therefore at or near the time when the Sept. version was made), the Jews and Samaritans disputed violently before the Egyptian king; and that the Samaritans, who were worsted in the dispute, were condemned to death.‡ But Hassencamp and others labor to show, that many of the departures in the Sept. from the Heb. text can more easily be accounted for by the supposition that they used a MS. written in the Sam. character; inasmuch as the similar letters in this character might easily lead them into the mistakes which they have made in their versions, while the Heb. square character, which has different similar letters, would not mislead them. It is unnecessary now to relate what former critics have replied in answer to these and all such arguments, depending on the forms of Heb. letters. Since Hassencamp and Eichhorn defended the above position, and since Gesenius replied to them, Kopp has published his 'Bilder und Schriften der Vorzeit,' which contains an essay on Themitish palæography, that bids fair, it is thought, to end all disputes about the ancient forms of Heb. letters. Instead of tracing back the square letter to Ezra, and to Chaldea, as nearly all the writers before him, not excepting Gesenius himself, had done, he has shown, by matter of fact, — by appeal to actually existing monuments, — that the square character had no existence until many years, probably two or three centuries, after the Christian era commenced; and that it was, like the altered forms in most other alphabets, a gradual work of time, of calligraphy, or tachygraphy. He has exhibited the gradual formation of it, from the earliest monuments found on the bricks of Babylon, down through the Phœnician, the old Heb. and Sam. inscriptions stamped on the Maccabean coins, and the older and more recent Palmyrene or Syriac characters, to the modern Heb. The reasoning employed by him, and the facts exhibited, are so convincing, that Gesenius himself, in the last edition of his Heb. Grammar, has yielded the point, and concedes that the square character of the Heb. is descended from the Palmyrene, i. e. such characters as are found in the inscriptions upon some of the ruins at Palmyra. All argument, from this source, then, is fairly put out of the question, by the masterly performance of Kopp. As the Sept. is well known, and universally acknowledged, to be a version made by the Jews for their own use at Alexandria, there cannot be even a remote probability that this version was made from a copy in the hands of the Samaritans, whom they abhorred as the perverters of the Jewish religion.

(2) The Sept. has been interpolated from the Sam. codex, or the Sam. from the Sept. Not the first; for the Jews certainly never loved the Samaritans sufficiently well, to alter their Greek Scriptures from the Sam. codex, so as to make them, at the same time, discrepant from their Heb. codex. Not the second; for the Samaritans would have been as averse to amending their own codex from a Jewish-Greek translation, as the Jews would have been to translate from the Sam. codex. Besides, the greatest part of the dis-

* Dr. A. Clarke says, 'About the year 1785, I began to read regularly the Sept., to acquaint myself more fully with the phraseology of the N. T.; as I found that this truly venerable version was that to which the evangelists and apostles appear to have had constant recourse, and from which in general they quote. Its study served more to illuminate and expand my mind, than all the theological works I had ever consulted. I had proceeded but a short way in it before I was convinced, that the prejudices against it were utterly unfounded, and that it was of incalculable advantage in understanding the lit. sense of Scripture.'—Gen. Pref. to Comment., p. 14.

† A translation of the first ch. of Dr. Holmes' learned preface to his ed. of the LXX. may be seen in the Christian Obs., vol. xx., to which the reader is referred for a more ample account of the editions of the Sept. The xxi. vol. contains a summary of the 3d and 3d chs. of the preface, which give an account of the principal MSS. used for Dr. Holmes' ed. Students will find Valpy's ed. of the Sept. very acceptable. It is comprised in a single volume, and carefully printed from the Oxf. ed. of Bos and Holmes.

crepancies between the Sam. and the Heb. are of such a nature as never could have proceeded from any design; inasmuch as they make no change at all in the sense of the passages where they are found. This opinion, then, is too improbable, though critics of no less name than Grotius, Usher, and Ravius, have patronized it.

(3) That both the Sam. and Sept. flowed from a common recension of the Heb. Scriptures; one, older, of course, than either, and differing in many places from the recension of the Masorites, now in common use. This is certainly a very ingenious supposition, and one which we cannot well avoid admitting as quite probable. It will account for the differences and for the agreements of the Sept. and Sam. On the supposition that two different recensions had long been in circulation among the Jews, the one of which was substantially what the Samaritan now is, with the exception of a few more recent and designed alterations of the text, and the other substantially what our Masoretic codex now is; then the Seventy, using the former, would of course accord, in a multitude of cases, with the peculiar readings of it, as they have now done. If we suppose, now, that the ancient copy from which the present Samaritan is descended, and that from which the Septuagint was translated, were of the same genus, so to speak, or of the same class, and yet were of different species under that genus, and had early been divided off, and subjected to alterations in transcribing, then we may have a plausible reason why the Sept., agreeing with the Sam. in so many places, should differ from it in so many others. Add to this, that the Sam. and Sept. each, in the course of being transcribed for several centuries, would receive more or less changes, that might increase the discrepancies between them. This seems to be the only probable way of critically accounting for the actual state of the Sam. and Sept. texts, compared with each other and with the Heb.

IX. But here we are trading on sacred ground. If these suggestions are well founded, then must it follow that, in the time of Ezra, and previously to his time, there existed recensions of the Jewish Scriptures which differed, in some respects, very considerably from each other. From this conclusion many will spontaneously revolt. All who have not made sacred criticism a study, or who, at least, have not been fully apprized of the character of various readings, and the sources in which they have originated, will be agitated with some unnecessary and ill-grounded fears.* But the position is no more dangerous than many others, which all enlightened critics admit.

1. It is probable; because, as it has been already shown, the actual state of the Sam. and Sept. codices renders it necessary to admit the position. Moreover, the Jews have from the most ancient times uniformly held a tradition, that Ezra, with his associates, whom they style the Great Synagogue, restored the law and the prophets, i. e. renewed and corrected the copies of them which had become erroneous during the captivity. Certainly, there is nothing at all improbable in this tradition. The corrected copies were the originals, probably, of our present Masoretic recension, which has in every age been in the keeping and under the inspection of the most learned Jews. The Sam. copy, and that from which the Sept. was translated, most probably belonged to the recension in common use among the Jews, and which, having been often copied, had come to differ in very many places from the corrected recensions of Ezra.

2. How far back some errors in this common recension may be dated, it is difficult to say, but in all probability even to the very first copies of the original autographs. Such we know to have been the case, as is now universally admitted, in respect to the early copies of the N. T. Is the O. T. under a more watchful and efficient Providence than the New? Or has it ever been so? Nothing but the belief of a miraculous aid, imparted to every copyist of the Heb. Scriptures, can, it is presumed, stand in the way of admitting the fact as it is now stated; and with such a belief, after several hundred thousand different readings have been actually selected from the MSS. of the O. T., it would not be worth while to expostulate.

X. In justice, however, to this subject, and to allay the fears of well-meaning persons, inexperienced in criticism, and therefore often exposed to groundless fears, a few words must be added, as to the dangers of the position now discussed.

1. A great part of it is evidently imaginary; for out of some 800,000 various readings, about 799,000 are of just as much importance to the sense of the Heb. Scriptures, as the question in English orthography is, whether the word honour shall be spelled with u, or without it. Of the remainder, some change the sense of particular passages or expressions, or omit particular words or phrases, or insert them; but not one doctrine of religion is changed, not one precept is taken away, not one important fact is altered, by the whole of the various readings collectively taken. This is clearly the case in respect to the various readings which are found in the Sam. and Sept., if we except the very few cases of alteration in them which plainly are the result of design, and which belong to more modern times. There is no ground, then, to fear for the safety of the Scriptures, on account of any legitimate criticism to which the text may be subjected.

2. Jerome long ago had shrewdness enough to say, that 'the Scripture was not the shell, but the nut;' by which he meant, that the sentiment of the Bible is the word of God, while the costume, i. e. the words in which this sentiment is conveyed, was of minor importance. So the apostles and so the Savior thought, for they have, in a multitude of cases (indeed, in almost all the appeals recorded in the N. T.), appealed to the authority of the O. T. by quoting the Sept. version of it; a version incomparably more incorrect, and differing from the original Heb. in incomparably more places, than the very worst version made in any modern times. But de minimis non curat lex; a truly noble maxim, yet one which superstition or ignorance knows not well how either to use or to estimate.

3. There is, then, no more danger in supposing that very early there were different recensions of the Heb. Scriptures, than in supposing that there are different ones of the Scriptures of the N. T., which all now admit; for it is not a matter of opinion and judgment, but of fact. The Bible, spreading through the whole earth, and becoming the rule of life and salvation to all nations, is at least as important now as it was when only one small nation admitted its claims. It is surely no more objection, then, against the watchful care of Providence over the church and the records of its holy religion, to admit that divers recensions of the Scriptures existed at an early age, than to admit that they now exist.

4. The fact, that various readings are found, not only in different classes of MSS., which have come down to us through different channels, but in cases where the same original documents are inserted in different places of the same class of MSS., is proved beyond contradiction; the first, by the actual comparison of MSS.; the second, by a comparison of different parts of Scripture. Such a comparison may be extended very much further; indeed, to a great portion of the books of Chronicles, by reading them in connection with the parallel places in the books of Kings, and other parts of the O. T.

Jahn's Heb. Bible is not only the best, but the only, work which will enable any one to do this without trouble, as he has disposed of the whole of the Chrs. in the way of harmony with other parts of Scripture. One thorough perusal and study of this will effectually set the matter at rest with any sober man.

5. Truth needs no concealment; and, at the present day, admits none. The Bible has nothing to fear from examination: it has ever been illustrated and confirmed by it; and so it will, doubtless, be still more so. But all 'pious frauds,' all 'expurgatory indices,' all suppression of facts and truths of any kind, only prove injurious at last to the cause which they are designed to aid. This is a sufficient reason for alighting them forever; not to insist on the disingenuousness which is implied in every artifice of this nature.†

SECTION IV.

THE GREEK TESTAMENT.

Causes of Error in the Text of the Greek Text.—Early Editions of the Text.—Critical Labors of Erasmus, Mill, Bengel, Wettstein, Griesbach, &c.—Modern Critical Editions.

1. We have now to sketch the literary history of the Text of the Greek Testament.

1. The same causes that gave rise to various readings in the Heb. text of the O. T. operated to produce them in the Gr. text of the New. From the periods of the original publication of these books down to the invention of printing, — a period of 1400 years, — the only method by which they could be multiplied, and thus rendered available for the purposes of general instruction, was that of transcription or writing; and as this process is so much more precarious than our present method of producing copies of literary works, it is evident that without a continued miracle, which we have no reason to expect, many deviations from the autographs of the sacred authors must have occurred. Letters would occasionally be exchanged, omitted, or improperly inserted; syllables and words be misspelled or transposed; and sentences be occasionally left out or repeated. Happily for us, however, the great multiplication and extensive circulation of copies furnish the materials for correction, and thus the causes of the errors become the means of their removal.

II. A summary account of the principal critical editions of the Greek Testament will show the progressive improvement of the text, and prepare the way for a discussion of the causes, the character, and the value of various readings.

1. The first edition of the N. T. appeared in 1516, under the editorship of the celebrated Erasmus. The MSS. upon which he formed his text, were only four in number; and the three of which he is found to have made the greatest use, contained only parts of the N. T., and in other respects were not of very high value. In addition to his MSS., Erasmus consulted the writings of some of the Greek Fathers, and also the Latin Vulgate; and where, in cases of difficulty, these afforded him no assistance, he corrected from conjecture. It is plain, therefore, from the character of the materials of which Erasmus was possessed, that, however learned and acute he may have been, his edition cannot possess the very highest degree of excellence. True, in his subsequent editions he made numerous alterations; but, notwithstanding many are improvements, they do not materially alter the character of his text.

2. The next edition was that printed in the Complutensian Polyglot; which, indeed, professes to have been printed two years prior to the appearance of Erasmus's first edition, though the publication was delayed till 1522. An examination of the Complutensian text has shown it to have been formed exclusively on comparatively modern MSS., and it therefore contributed little or nothing toward restoring the purity of the Gr. text.

3. In the year 1546, Robert Stephens, the celebrated printer at Paris, published the first edition of his N. T., which is proved to be little more than a compilation from the Erasmus and Complutensian texts. In 1550, he published a 3d edition, once supposed to have had its text formed on the authority of Gr. MSS., as professed by the editor in his preface; but a careful examination has shown it to be hardly any thing more than a reprint of the 5th edition of Erasmus.

4. Beza's edition followed next in order (1565); but although he possessed some valuable materials for correcting the errors which had crept into the common text, he only amended that of Stephens in about 50 places, and not always for the better.

5. The first of the Elzevir editions, in which was established the text now in common use, and known as the Textus Receptus, was published in 1624, from Beza's edition, except in about 50 places, where the readings were borrowed partly from the margin of Stephens's edition, and partly from other editions. 'The Textus Receptus, therefore,' it seems, 'was copied, with a few exceptions, from the text of Beza, who closely followed Stephens, and Stephens (in his 3d ed.) copied solely from Erasmus, except in the Revelation, where he followed sometimes Erasmus, and sometimes the Complutensian editors. The text, therefore, in common use, resolves itself at last into the Complutensian and the Erasmus editions. But neither Erasmus nor the Complutensian editors printed from ancient Gr. MSS.; and the remainder of their critical apparatus included little more than the latest of the Gr. Fathers, and the Latin Vulgate.' It is obvious, therefore, that but little had yet been effected towards giving consistency and permanency to the Gr. text. For the attainment of so desirable an object, however, there were not wanting able and laborious critics. Walton, Usher, Curellæus, and Fell, respectively contributed to it by the collation of MSS. and the comparison of ancient versions.

6. Between the years 1653-7, the London Polyglot made its appearance; and in 1707, Dr. Mill published his critical edition of the Gr. Test., upon which he had expended the labor of 13 years. The text adopted by Mill was that of Stephens's 3d ed.; but it was accompanied by no fewer than 30,000 various readings, collected not only from Gr. MSS., and previously printed editions, as well as the oriental and other ancient versions, but also from the quotations by the early Fathers in their respective works. The prolegomena give a full and distinct account of their sources.*

7. It is to be remarked, however, that, from the time Beza published his ed., no alterations had been made in the text. The several critics, to whose labors we have adverted, contributed largely to augment the materials for its improvement, but left their application in the emendation of the text to those who should succeed them.

8. The earliest edition of the Gr. Test., in which the critical apparatus of Mill was applied to the revision of the text, was the one undertaken by Dr. Edward Wells, and published between 1713 and 1718. In 1734, Bengel, a learned professor in Germany, furnished a still more valuable edition for critical purposes, in which he added to the materials collected by Mill, extracts from upwards of 20 Gr. MSS., from several of the ancient Latin versions, and also from the Armenian tr. These he did not venture to apply to the revision of the text, except in the Apocalypse, but printed under the text, and classed according to their respective values.

9. We have now arrived at the period when the elaborate and splendid edition of Wetstein made its appearance, superseding all that had gone before. The text adopted by Wetstein was that of Elzevir, or the one in common use; but it was accompanied by nearly a million of quotations, in the margin, collected from various sources. But 'though Wetstein very considerably augmented the stock of critical materials; though he drew from various sources, which had hitherto remained unopened; though he collected, not by other hands, but by his own; and though few men have possessed a greater share either of learning or of sagacity, — yet no alteration was made in the Gr. text. He proposed, indeed, alterations, which he inserted in the space between the text and the body of various readings, with reference to the words which he thought should be exchanged for them; and where a reading should, in his opinion, be omitted without the substitution of another, he prefixed to it a mark of minus in the text. But these proposed alterations and omissions are, in general, supported by powerful authority, and commonly commend themselves to an impartial critic. Though, among the various readings, he has occasionally noted the conjectures of others, he has never ventured a conjecture of his own; nor has he made conjecture, in any one instance, the basis of a proposed alteration.† Wetstein's edition may therefore be regarded as not only the most elaborate, but also as the most valuable, critical edition extant. It is in two folio volumes, and was published in 1751 and 1752.

10. Eleven years after this, Mr. Bowyer published an edition of the Greek text, in which he adopted such of the various readings collected by Wetstein as that eminent critic has suggested to be preferable to the textual readings: it is therefore valuable as a critical edition, but requires to be used with caution and judgment.

11. The last edition which the plan of this work requires us to notice, is that of Griesbach, the first impression of which appeared in the years 1775 and 1777; but was afterwards materially improved, and republished in 1796-1806. In this laborious work, Griesbach employed all the materials that had been collected by his predecessors, as well as many more procured from Gr. MSS. by his own industry. The various readings of Bengel, Mill, and Wetstein, were subjected to a scrupulous examination, as were those collected by Matthæi, Alter, and Birch; the Latin versions published by Blanchini and Sabatier, and the Sahidic, the Armenian, and the Slavonian versions, as well as the fragments of the two very ancient Gr. MSS. preserved at Wolfenbüttel, were carefully collated (though some of them not expressly for this work); and then the whole of the materials, thus accumulated, were applied to the revision of the text. The design of Griesbach was to collect in a small compass the critical apparatus which lay dispersed in various works, and to prepare an edition of the Gr. Test. which should contain a text freed from considerable errors, accompanied by such helps as might facilitate interpretation; to exhibit the more important various readings, and the authorities on which they are supported, together with the editor's judgment respecting them.

'That Griesbach has fulfilled his duties to the public,' says Bp. Marsh; 'that his diligence was unremitted; that his caution was extreme; that his erudition was profound; and that his judgment was directed by a sole regard to the evidence before him, — will, in general, be allowed by those who have studied his edition, and are able to appreciate its merits. That his decisions are always correct; that, in all cases, the evidence is so nicely weighed as to produce unerring results; that weariness of mind, under painful investigation, has in no instance occasioned an important oversight; that prejudice or partiality has no where influenced his general regard for critical justice, — would be affirmations which can hardly apply to any editor, however good or great. But, if at any time he has erred, he has, at the same time, enabled those who are competent judges to decide for themselves, by stating the contending evidence with clearness and precision. Emendations, founded on conjecture, however ingenious, he has introduced not in a single instance. They are all founded on quoted authority. Our attention is even solicited and directed to that authority, the adopted readings being always printed in smaller characters than the rest of the text, and with reference to the rejected readings, which are printed in the inner margin in the same letters with the text, while both of them refer to the respective evidence which is produced below. If readings are added where none existed before, or are withdrawn without substitution, the changes are marked with equal clearness, and are equally supported by critical authority. When the evidence is not sufficiently decisive to warrant an alteration in the text, the readings worthy of notice are placed in the inner margin, with different marks expressive of their different claims. Such is the character of this important work, which, with the prolegomena belonging to it, forms a treasure of biblical learning of incalculable value.‡

12. There have been several editions of the Gr. Test., in which the most important of Griesbach's adopted readings have been inserted: in some of them there are additional corrections. The following are deserving of special notice.¶

* Dr. R. T. Bloomfield has recently published a very valuable edition of the Gr. Test., with English notes, critical, philological, and exegetical, in 2 vols. 8vo. It is beautifully printed; the text (which is formed on the basis of the last edition by R. Stephens, adopted by Mill, without deviation, 'except on the most preponderating evidence') occupying the upper part of the page, and the notes, in two columns, the lower. [This has been republished in the United States, 1837.]

† Bishop Marsh's Lectures, p. 152.

‡ Of the MSS. used by Griesbach (see next section) he has given a complete catalogue in his Prolegomena, with an account of the age and character of each, its state of preservation, and the portions of the N. T. it contains. In vol. ii. is contained a complete and accurate collection of the quotations from the N. T. found in Origen and Clement of Alexandria. The quotations, in the works of these Fathers, are so numerous, that, had all the other documents been lost, nearly the whole of the N. T. might have been restored from Origen alone.

¶ Bloomfield ventures to call him, 'rash and innovating.' En.

¶ In purchasing Griesbach's work, care should be taken to procure the recent edition, that is, the one printed at Halle, in 1796 and 1806; or else the London edition of 1818. It is in 2 vols. 8vo. A new edition of Griesbach's text is now in course of publication, in Germany, with many important additions, by Dr. Schulz. The first volume was published in 1827.

¶ (1) Dr. Knapp's, reprinted in London, 1 vol. 8vo.

(2) Professor Schott's, also in 1 vol. 8vo. (Lipsia, 3d edit., 1825), in which the Gr. text is accompanied by a Latin version. This, as far as we have examined it, is strongly tinctured by the prevalent and heterodox theology of Germany.

(3) Professor White's (2 vols. 8vo. Oxford, 1806) consists of the Textus Receptus, or common text, but exhibits very distinctly those readings which Griesbach would remove; those he considers of equal or superior value to the received text; and those insertions he conceives the authority of MSS. to justify.

(4) Aitton's edition of Griesbach's text was issued from the Glasgow University press, in 1821, in 1 vol. 32mo.; and subsequently in an equally correct and beautiful reprint.

(5) The Gr. Test. published by Mr. Bagster, and forming part of his beautiful, accurate, and cheap Polyglot Bible, in a single folio volume, is printed from the text of Mill, but exhibits, in 22 pages, at the beginning, the various readings of Griesbach which are referred to in the text by appropriate marks. The low price and portable form of this edition give it strong claims to preference. But Mr. B. has also issued the following:

(6) The Gr. Test. (in fcp. 16mo., about the length of one's finger), in which the received text is adopted, but having, in a centre column of the page, the whole of the various readings of Griesbach, as contained in his ed. 1805, in which, besides his amended text, he has given the more important of those readings that differ equally from his own as the more important, coined text. In addition to these, are inserted the theses of difficult words, after the plan of Hoole, but differing from his Text. In that, whereas his work was exclusively adapted to the Lexicon of Fauror, in which the

in question, would be omitted in the derived copy.

That such omissions have frequently occurred, we have all the evidence that the subject admits of. The most remarkable instance occurs in Mat. 27:35, where all the words which, in the received text, stand between kleron near the beginning of the v. and the same word at the end of the v. are omitted in 98 known MSS., the principal versions, and some of the Fathers; upon the authority of which they are rejected as spurious by Wetstein and Griesbach. Michaelis, however, defends their integrity upon the principle of a homoioteleuton, judiciously arguing that the interpolation of the omitted words so as exactly to suit the context is very difficult to be conceived, whereas their omission, on the principle just mentioned, would be a very natural accident. It cannot, he remarks, be an interpolation from Jn. 19:24, where the quotation is differently introduced; and, moreover, the author of the quoted Psalm is in the disputed passage styled the prophet, the application of which title to the Psalmist is peculiar to Matthew.

In the Heb. SS. there is such an omission, in Jud. xvi. 13, in the latter part of the v. A reference to the passage will show that its sense is not complete: 'And he (Samson) said unto her (Delilah). If thou weavest the seven locks of my head with the web.' This ends the address of Samson; and the following v. begins—'And she fastened it with the pin, &c. Now, it seems very strange, that Samson should direct Delilah to weave the locks of his head, and nothing more; and that she should omit to do this, and adopt an expedient which he had not suggested; namely, fasten his hair with a pin. But such is the representation of the passage. It might be thought highly probable, therefore, that there is an omission in our present text; but we are not left to conjecture, for the Sept., no doubt following the old Heb. text, has the following addition to the words of Samson, as they stand in our copies, and are cited above:—'And shall fasten them with a pin in the wall, I shall become weak like other men: and so it was, that when he slept, Delilah took the seven locks of his head, and wove them with the web.' Then follows v. 14, as in our version. Now the part omitted closes with the same words (חַסְמֵהוּ בַּחֹמֶת, with the web) as those now closing v. 13; and the copyist, having written onward to the first member of the sentence where they stand, in again looking at his original, alighted on them at the end of the sentence, and, mistaking them for the words he had just written, naturally passed on to the v. following; consequently all the words lying between were left out in his copy.

But it will be evident, on a moment's reflection, that this same thing, i. e. the recurrence of a word after a short passage, might also give rise to another description of error; namely, a repetition of the words lying between.

In 2 K. 7:13, this appears to have been the case, for we have there a repetition of seven words, which seem entirely useless, though our venerable translators, with most others, have not thought themselves at liberty to reject them. An inspection of the original will show how easily this repetition might originate, in the manner we have supposed; and if the conjecture here ventured be well founded, the words below enclosed in brackets are spurious: 'And one of his servants answered and said, Let some take, I pray thee, five of the horses that remain, which are left in the city, behold they are all for the multitude of Israel that [are left in it; behold, I say, they are even as all the multitude of the Israelites that] are consumed.'

The disputed words are wanting in the oldest of Kennicott's MSS., and in forty others collated by him and De Rossi; neither are they contained in the Greek or Syriac versions.

f) Another source of error, nearly allied to the last, is the immediate repetition of letters, the latter of which, being mistaken for the former, are left out.

To perceive clearly the probability of such errors, the manner in which the ancient MSS. were written must be recalled. This was in a continuous text, without any space between the words, in which case the chances of mistake were much greater and more numerous than they would be according to the present system of writing. To illustrate this, we may refer to Lu. 7:21, where several MSS. omit the article (TO). The original MSS. would read thus:

ΕΧΑΠΙΕΑΤΟΒΑΕΙΗΝ

if the article were inserted; and if omitted, thus:

ΕΧΑΠΙΕΑΤΟΒΑΕΙΗΝ.

In some cases of this kind, there is no internal evidence for settling a disputed reading; since it is impossible to decide whether the letters in question have been omitted or repeated, where either way of writing the passage makes out a good sense. In such circumstances, critics are governed by the number and character of the testimonies on either side. Again,

g) A person, having written one or more words from a wrong place, and not choosing to erase it, might return to the right one, and thus produce the improper insertion of a word or a clause.

This has probably been the case in Mat. 26:60, among other passages, where the first 'but found none,' is superfluous and improper, and is wanting in one MS. In 2 Cor. 12:7, the second 'lest I should be exalted above measure,' is wanting in several MSS., and two ancient versions; it is also superfluous.*

A) When a transcriber, having discovered his omission, subjoined what he had omitted, he would obviously produce a transposition in the text.

Thus Mat. 5:4 is subjoined to ver. 5, in Cambridge Vulg. Jerome; and Lu. 23:17, is omitted in the Alexandrian and one other, while it is subjoined to v. 19, in Camb.†

3. The third cause of various readings noticed, was the assumption of marginal glosses into the text. This appears to have been a fruitful source of error, and has been occasioned in various ways. Thus, the possessor of a MS. might write in the margin,

- a) An explanation of a difficult passage;
- b) A word synonymous to one in the text, but more common, or easily understood; or,
- c) The modern name of a place;
- d) A correction of some real or supposed error;
- e) A parallel passage in some other place.

In all, or in any of these cases, where a copyist supposed the marginal notes to have been parts of the text, accidentally omitted in the copy which contained them, and afterwards supplied in this manner, he would transfer them at once into his copy, in their supposed places, and thus produce a discrepancy between that and other copies taken from the same MS., but in which the marginal glosses were omitted. It is likely, too, that there might be variations in two or more copies taken from a MS. having marginal notes, where all the transcribers had inserted them in the text, but not in precisely the same place.

4. By designed alterations of a literary description, is meant such alterations as consist in a correction of supposed errors in the text; the substitution of a modern for an obsolete name or word; of an elegant for a barbarous phrase; or of a common for a dialectic form of speech.

5. The last source was the corruption of the text for party purposes; but upon this it is obviously unnecessary to enlarge, except to say, that although there is good reason to believe it has been attempted, the very nature of the writings upon which the fraud was to be practised, and the wide extent of their circulation, as well as the watchful jealousy with which the different sects of religionists have at all times viewed each other, rendered it impossible to any material extent.‡

3. We have been thus particular in giving a general idea of the nature of various readings, to enable those persons to whom the subject is new, to see that their total value, although their number should amount to two millions, is, comparatively, very insignificant. All those who suppose that the Scripture depends on a word or a letter, so essentially, that it is not Scripture if either be changed or omitted, must, if they will be consistent, abandon the whole Bible, in which many changes of this kind, it is past all question, have actually taken place. The critic wonders not that so many, but that no more, have been experienced, as he well may, if all the circumstances be taken into account.

4. But to return to the real and comparative value of these readings. To what do they amount? To say nothing of those which are mere errata,—as the interchange of letters or words, the transposing of words in a sentence, the improper division of letters into words, the mistaking of a contraction, and other things of a like kind, about which there would be no difficulty in determining, even if we possessed not a single tolerably correct MS.,—it will be evident to any person who takes the trouble to examine (and those who will not are not entitled to a hearing), that (from the abundance of our materials, in the shape of MSS., quotations in ancient authors, and early versions, added to the knowledge we possess of the causes of existing errors) 999 of them out of every 1000 may be removed, and the original reading restored, with ease, after the critical apparatus has been formed. For this purpose there are certain laws of what is technically called conjectura critica; and where the process is conducted according to these, we may place the most unhesitating reliance on the result.

III. To discuss largely the character of these critical laws, would be out of place; but the following remarks will probably interest those wholly unacquainted with the subject.

1. The value of a contested reading is not estimated merely by the number and antiquity of the MSS. in which it is found; not by the number of the MSS. merely, because, if a hundred copies have been taken from one exemplar, their united authority amounts but to that of the parent MS.; not by their antiquity merely, because a very ancient MS. may have been derived from the original autograph through a greater number of copies than a more modern one may have been; or it may have been written by a less skilful or conscientious person.

2. As it regards the Heb. Bible, we have not the advantage of comparing a number of MSS. derived from the original autographs, through independent sources, as in the case of the Greek Test.; because we know that all the existing copies, excepting the Codex Malabaricus, about which critics are not fully agreed, have been made from MSS. revised by the Masoretic critics after the 6th century of the Christian era.§ But we have, nevertheless, as was seen from the considerations suggested on this topic in a previous section, the fullest assurance of the general accuracy of the Masoretic text.

3. But the case is widely different as respects the text of the Greek Test., for con-

* Gerard's Institutes, p. 238.

† Ibid.

‡ Mr. L. Taylor judiciously remarks, that so many are our means for detecting literary corruptions, drawn from a comparison of different MSS., in from the incongruity of the interpolated passage, that there is, perhaps, altogether, more probability that, from some accidental peculiarity of style, genuine passages of ancient authors should fall under suspicion, than that any actually spurious portions should entirely escape it.—Hist. of the Transmission of Anc. Books, p. 27.

§ There is a MS. in the Bodleian library, numbered Laud. A. 17? and 163, 2 v. folio, on vellum, and in the Span. Heb. character, which is thought to have had its text formed before the Masoretic revision, from which it differs no less than 14,000 times: in a great number of these instances it agrees with the ancient versions; and in the Pent. with the Sam.

ducting the criticism of which there are certain canons of a peculiar character; and Bp. Marsh sets this matter in a very clear light, thus:

(1) 'In determining the quantum of evidence for or against a particular reading, the authorities used to be rather numbered than weighed; so that, if a reading were contained in thirty MSS. out of fifty, the scale was supposed to turn in its favor. It is true that, under similar circumstances, more importance was attached to ancient than to modern MSS.; but the modes of estimating that importance were so various, that the same premises not unfrequently led to different conclusions. Nor was due attention paid to that necessary distinction between the antiquity of a MS. and the antiquity of its text. Wetstein, in his Animadversiones et Cautiones, annexed to his Gr. Test., went a great way toward the reduction of sacred criticism to a regular system; but much still remained to be performed, for which we are indebted to Semler, who laid the foundation; and to Griesbach, who raised the superstructure.

(2) 'From a comparison and combination of the readings exhibited by Wetstein, it was discerned that certain characteristic readings distinguished certain MSS., Fathers, and Versions; that other characteristic readings pointed out a second class; others, again, a third class of MSS., Fathers, and Versions. It was further discovered, that this threefold classification had an additional foundation in respect to the places where the MSS. were written, the Fathers lived, and the Versions were made. Hence the three classes received the names of Recensio Alexandrina, Recensio Constantinopolitana, or Byzantina, and Recensio Occidentalis; not that any formal revision of the Greek text is known, either from history or from tradition, to have taken place at Alexandria, at Constantinople, or in Western Europe. But whatever causes, unknown to us, may have operated in producing the effect, there is no doubt of its existence; there is no doubt that those characteristic readings are really contained in the MSS., Fathers, and Versions; and that the classification, which is founded on them, is founded therefore on truth. Hence arises a new criterion of authenticity. A majority of individual MSS. can no longer be considered either as decisive or even as very important on this subject. A majority of the recensions,^{*} or, as we should say, of printed books, a majority of the editions, is alone to be regarded as far as number is concerned. The testimony of the individual MSS. is applied to ascertain what is the reading of this or that edition; but, the question of fact being once determined, it ceases to be of consequence what number of MSS. may be produced, either of the first, or of the second, or of the third of those editions. For instance, when we have once ascertained that any particular reading belongs both to the Alexandrine and to the Western, but not to the Byzantine edition, the authority of that reading will not be weakened, even though it should appear, on counting the MSS., that the number of those which range themselves under the Byzantine edition is ten times greater than that of the other two united. We must argue, in this case, as we argue in the comparison of printed editions, when we simply inquire, what are the readings of this or that edition, and never that of asking, for the purpose of criticism, how many copies were struck off at the office where it was printed. The relative value of those three editions must likewise be considered. For if any one of them, the Byzantine for instance, to which most of the modern MSS. belong, carries with it less weight than either of the other two, a proportional deduction must be made, whether it be thrown into the scale by itself, or in conjunction with another. Such are the outlines of that system which Griesbach has applied to the criticism of the Gr. Test. The subject is so new, and at the same time so intricate, that it is hardly possible to give more than a general notion of it in a public lecture. It requires long and laborious investigation; but which every biblical scholar will readily undertake, when he considers that it involves the question, What is the genuine text of the New Testament?[†]

IV. The critical observations of Griesbach, and his enunciation of the rules by which he was governed in his selection and adoption of various readings, will be found highly valuable to the student, as well as gratifying to the more general reader, by pointing out the laborious process and extreme precaution through which the amended text of the Gr. Test., now forming the basis of all critical labors, has been obtained. They are given in the note, below:

* Instead of Recensio or Revision, Bengel adopts the term familia, family; and Michælis, edition. These different phrases, therefore, mean the same thing.

† Lectures, Part I. Lect. 6.

1. In examining various readings, the internal goodness is to be regarded, as well as the weight and consent of testimony. Internal goodness is determined by the fact, that a particular reading suits the manner, style, scope, and other circumstances of the author; or by this, that it can be shown to be probable that all others have sprung from it. In applying this latter criterion, we must keep in mind the general causes which lead transcribers into error, and also the particular causes which affect transcribers of the N. T., and especially that arising from the difference of its style from that of classic Greek. From that canon of criticism which prefers the reading which will account for the origin of the others with the greatest facility, the following rules, among others, are deduced.

(1) A shorter reading is preferable to a longer and more verbose, unless destitute of ancient and weighty authority. The reason is, that transcribers have always been more disposed to add to the text than to omit what belongs to it, and it is more likely that incidental circumstances should give rise to additions than to omissions. He goes on to show particularly in what cases either is to be preferred.

(2) The more difficult and obscure reading is superior to one extremely plain.

(3) The harsher reading, that, for instance, which is elliptical, or which contains a Hebraism or a solecism, is preferable to the smoother.

(4) The less usual is to be more common.

(5) The less emphatic phraseology to the contrary, unless the context and design of the writer require emphasis.

(6) That reading is to be preferred which conveys a sense seeming at first incorrect, but upon careful examination proved to be true.

(7) Readings which may be traced to an inclination of transcribers to introduce terminations which they had just written or were about to write, are of no authority; nor those which arise from connected words beginning with the same syllable or letter.

(8) When several readings occur of the same place, that is to be esteemed the best which may be called the medium from which all the others may be shown to have originated.

(9) Those readings are to be rejected which it is admitted were introduced into the text from the commentaries of Fathers or old scholiasts. Although the more modern copies chiefly have been injured by interpolations, yet there is no MS., however ancient, that is entirely free from glosses; and many have flowed from the commentaries and extenuations of the Fathers written on the margin. Still, the rule is to be applied with great caution; and it is always to be recollected, that the agreement of a MS. with scholia, will by no means prove it to have been corrupted by the scholia, as the agreement may have sprung from other causes.

(10) Those readings which have arisen in lectionaries, and add to, or remove, or alter a passage, whether to introduce the lesson or to diminish difficulties, are to be rejected. But here the same caution must be exercised as in the former rule.

(11) Lastly, those are to be condemned which have found their way into Greek copies from the Latin version. This rule, which is very sound and correct, has been greatly abused by some learned men, who, whenever they discovered a reading differing from that of the common mass of books, and agreeing with the Latin version, immediately inferred that the MSS. containing it Latinized. But to prove such an interpolation, other marks are necessary besides mere consent. After giving these and a few other rules, to ascertain the internal goodness of a reading, Griesbach examines on what the authority of testimony is supported. There must be weight and consent.

(a) The weight of testimony is determined partly by age and partly by other favorable circumstances. The age is not to be inferred simply or principally from that of the parchments: it is the antiquity of the text, and not of the transcriber, which is important; and this is ascertained by its frequent agreement with other witnesses, particularly Versions and Fathers, whose age is well known. There are MSS. the text of which is composed sometimes of ancient and sometimes of more modern readings; and it is necessary to examine them with caution, and not to infer the high antiquity of their text from a few readings. Further, a MS. may be of great antiquity and excellence, and yet in certain places it may be corrupted by lectionaries, or by the Latin version; still, in those parts where there is no reason to suspect any corruption, it may have great weight. Although the learning and ability of a transcriber, and the fact of his having used a good and ancient copy, are circumstances which ought to count with them great authority, yet it is evidently necessary to apply them with no small care. It is the character of the copy alone which generally assists in determining the question, from what MS. it was transcribed; then, again, the MS., although old, may have been corrupted, and where it is so, the transcriber's fidelity is of no importance.

The errors of a transcriber are readily distinguishable from the original readings, by separating those peculiar to the MS. from others which it has in common with many MSS.

(b) With respect to the consent of testimonies, it is important to remark that this must not be identified with the exhibition of the same reading by a great number; it is necessary that they be really different witnesses. There are above a hundred MSS. of the Gospels, which, being derived from one source, agree in almost every syllable, with the exception of such readings as are caused by errors of copyists, and others arising from peculiar causes. Hence, then, the necessity of distinguishing testimonies into classes.

2. The author informs us, in his preface, that his plan of distinguishing from each other the different recensions of the Greek text, which from the commencement of the third century, at least, have existed,—of separating, as far as possible, the primitive readings of each recension from later interpolations,—of distributing MSS., Versions, and Fathers, into different classes, according to the difference of the recension which each one followed,—of reckoning all the witnesses of one class, whether many or few, as one witness only,—and of attributing to each recension its legitimate importance,—was suggested by Bengel, and commenced by Semler. In his Prolegomena, he proceeds as follows: Recensions of the text of the N. T. exist, as also of many Latin and Greek works. The want of proper records makes it impossible to trace the history of these recensions. A comparison of Origen with Tertullian and Cyprian proves that, at least in the beginning of the 3d century, there were two. That which, after Clement of Alexandria and Origen, the Alexandrians used, may be called the Alexandrine; the other, made use of, from Tertullian's time, in Africa, Italy, Gaul, and other occidental countries, may be called the Western, although its use was not confined to the western part of the empire. From each of these recensions in the Gospels (to which the author confines his remarks) differs the text of A, which agrees sometimes with the Alexandrine recension, sometimes with the Western, sometimes with both together, but very often varies from both, and approximates somewhat nearer the received text. With this MS. others are kindred, that are marked EFGHS, which, however, have very many modern readings, and are also much more closely allied to the received text. All these (AEFGHS) seem to agree in the Gospels, so far as imperfect collations with the Fathers of the 4th century, and of the 5th and 6th centuries in Greece, Asia Minor, and that vicinity, enable us to ascertain: this may be called the Constantinopolitan recension, because it was most generally used in that patriarchate, and there widely disseminated by means of numberless copies. From it came the Relatiuncula version. The Syrian version, as we have it in printed editions, is not like any of these recensions; but neither is it altogether unlike any. In many of its readings, it agrees with the Alexandrine, in more with the Western, and in some with the Constantinopolitan; yet at the same time it rejects most of those which found their way into this recension in later ages. It seems, therefore, to have been at different periods again and again revised, according to Greek MSS. evidently different. In addition to MSS. which exhibit one of these ancient recensions, some contain a text compiled from the readings of two or three. This is probably the case also with the Ethiopic, Armenian, Sahidic, and Jerusalem-Syrian versions.

3. That the observations already made may be the more useful in

V. Against Griesbach's classification of MSS., some formidable objections were urged by Mathew, Laurence, and Nolan; and critics of eminence have proposed other recensions in its stead. It may be safely affirmed, however, that no one of these affects the readings of Griesbach, generally, but only the process of reasoning by which they have been established.*

VI. The Versions and Fathers which are found to agree with the recensions or editions just enumerated, are, 1. The ALEXANDRINE, or Egyptian edition: with this agree the quotations of Origen, and the Coptic version. 2. The BYZANTINE, or Eastern edition: with this agree the greater number of the many MSS. written by the monks on Mount Athos. Also the quotations in Chrysostom, Theophylact, Bishop of Bulgaria, and the Slavonic or Russian version. The common printed text of the Gr. Test. has generally the readings of this recension. 3. The OCCIDENTAL, or Western edition, which was formerly used where the Latin language was spoken, agrees with the old Itala, the Vulgate, and the quotations in the Latin Fathers.

To these three, Michaelis has added, 4. The EDESSENE edition; but of this no MSS. are now known.

VII. It only remains to suggest a few additional considerations relative to the various readings in the Scriptures, with a view to remove any unfavorable impressions which may have been created in the minds of persons not conversant with this department of biblical criticism.

1. In innumerable cases we see the proverb verified, that 'He who knows nothing, fears every thing;' and it is quite applicable to the subject of various readings in the Scriptures. The first attempts to compare MSS., and to collect these readings, were denounced as being horribly profane and dangerous. Yet the comparison went on. Next, it was admitted to be right in respect to the N. T., but very wrong in regard to the Old; every word, and letter, and vowel-point, and accent of which, Buxtorf roundly asserted to be essentially the same all the world over. More than 800,000 various readings, actually collected, have dissipated this illusion, and taught how groundless the fears of those were, who were altogether inexperienced in the criticism of the sacred text. The real theologian is satisfied, from his own examination, that the accumulation of many thousands of various readings, obtained at the expense of immense critical labor, does not affect a single sentiment in the whole Old or New Test. And thus is Criticism, which some despise and others neglect, found to be one of those undecaying columns, by which the imperishable structure of Christian truth is supported.

2. But it would be no difficult matter to show, that the fact of these variations in the text of the Heb. and Gr. Scriptures, as found in the various MSS., and other documents classed with them by biblical critics, do really afford incontestable arguments in favor of the authenticity of the Bible. No book, as Michaelis has remarked, is more exposed to the suspicion of wilful corruption than the Scripture, for the very reason, that it is the fountain of divine knowledge; and if in all the MSS. now extant we found a similarity in the readings, we should have reason to suspect that the ruling party of the Christian church had endeavored to annihilate whatever was inconsistent with its own tenets, and by violence produce a general uniformity in the sacred text; whereas, the different readings of the MSS. in our possession afford sufficient proof that they were written independently of each other, by persons separated by distance of time, remoteness of place, and diversity of opinions. They are not the works of a single faction, but of Christians of all denominations, whether dignified with the title of orthodox, or branded by the ruling church with the name of heretic; and though no single MS. can be regarded as a perfect copy of the writings of the apostles, yet the truth lies scattered in them all, which it is the business of critics to select from the general mass.†

3. On the other hand, we may say, with the most perfect confidence, that the sacred writings have not, in any thing essential, been obscured or hurt by all the changes which have passed upon the original text. The various readings have left to it all its peculiar characteristics, as a work of ancient literature, and a record of revealed religion. Mistakes will be most frequently committed, says Dr. Cook, where the attention of the transcriber, or of those who revise his copy, is most apt to slumber. As the inattention will be greatest in points of little consequence, so it may be expected, that what is of importance will excite more attention, and be more faithfully transmitted. Even the mistakes into which ignorant transcribers, incapable of this discrimination, fall, are limited by the circumstances that are known to give rise to them, and, in general, might be expected either to indicate themselves, or to be discovered by collating different MSS.; while the more serious injury which might arise to the text from the inadvertent or ill-judged intrusion of explanatory readings from the margin, or from the designed corruption of it to serve a purpose, is naturally either prevented, or corrected, by the mutual jealousy and vigilance of contending sects. And such, from the most thorough examination of the different channels of evidence that has yet been made, appears to be the state in which the text of the N. T. has been preserved. The various readings have never yet been found to go beyond the limits thus fixed to error. The greatest number is in letters or words which make no alteration upon the sense; and where the sense is affected, it is generally in points of no consequence to any religious truth. As the inquiry concerning the writers of the Scriptures leaves no good reason for doubting that the different books were written by the persons to whom they are attributed, so the inquiry concerning the uncorrupted state of the text affords every reasonable security, that in all essential points it remains at this day as it was at first given to the world. There is not a MS. yet discovered so incorrectly written, that does not bear testimony to this its escape from every vitiation, by which its value, as a treasury of religious truth, could be impaired; nor does it appear that all the attention which, since the revival of learning, has been paid to this subject, goes further than to place the evidence of the fact in its proper light, and to contribute towards preserving and illustrating that evidence for the benefit of future ages. For, although the printed text cannot be justly considered as having attained, either before or since the labors of modern critics, the highest point of renovated integrity to which it may be brought, by the most extensive collation and judicious selection of readings, from MSS., versions, and quotations; and although a beautiful field of biblical criticism is thus left open for further research; yet, upon satisfactory grounds, it may be safely asserted, that this possible progress, in its grammatical accuracy, as it has not hitherto brought, gives no promise of bringing, any accession to the information contained in the Scriptures, and threatens no change upon their statement of any important fact, sentiment, or doctrine.‡

SECTION VI.

THE ENGLISH BIBLE.

Early English Versions — 'The Authorized Version' — Its critical Value — Its Imperfections.

I. Although sacred criticism has immediately to do with the Scriptures in their original languages, it is also, though more remotely, conversant with versions.

1. The character of the English Bible is not a matter of idle curiosity, or of curious and unprofitable speculation. Every translation is, properly speaking, an interpretation of the original text; and it is surely of the very first importance to ascertain how far that translation, which is in daily and constant use by millions of those to whom the word of promise is addressed, and upon which they are exclusively dependent for ascertaining 'the mind of the Spirit,' is really a faithful and exact representation of the sense of the sacred writers. This section will be devoted to the topics involved in this inquiry.

2. It is in some degree uncertain at what period the Scriptures were originally transmitted the reader to form an estimate of readings either belonging to one recension or common to more, the author lays down a few premonitions.

(1) It is necessary for a critic to be well acquainted with the characteristics of a recension, with whatever makes it more or less valuable. The Alexandrine acts the grammarian; the Western, the expositor, and by no means unfrequently without success.

(2) No recension is to be found uncolored, in any MS. now extant. The causes of this are briefly but clearly stated. Yet errors in one MS. are not to be ascribed to the whole recension.

(3) It is of great importance to discover the primitive reading of each recension. This is to be done by comparing all the MSS., Fathers, and Versions, of the same recension, and by selecting from among their readings that which is most strongly recommended, both by testimonies of higher antiquity, and by internal marks of goodness.

(4) Before the genuineness of one reading among many can be determined, we must examine to what recension any one is to be referred. The inquiry is not, How many MSS., now existing, agree in any reading? for all the testimonies of the same recension are to be regarded as one, and therefore two or three MSS. may be of as much weight as a hundred others, because some recensions are preserved in a few only, others in a great number. Greek MSS. are but seldom written in the western provinces after the 4th century, and in Egypt after the 6th; but in the patriarchate of Constantinople, the Greek monks were indefatigable in multiplying copies of the N. T. until the 15th.

(5) If all the old recensions originally agreed in any reading, it is undeniably the true one, even if afterwards another should have been introduced into a multitude of more modern MSS.

(6) If all the recensions did not originally agree in the same reading, that which has the support of the most ancient is the best, unless there be special circumstances to the contrary, arising from the character of the recension.

(7) From the consent of the Alexandrine recension with the Westerns, it is concluded, on very good grounds, that a reading common to both is by far the most ancient, and, indeed, if supported by its internal goodness, genuine. If it be destitute of this goodness, the want must be balanced against the consent of the two recensions.

(8) If the Alexandrine agrees with the Constantinopolitan, while the Western differs from both, we are to examine whether the reading which has the sanction of the Western be of a class in which the errors of this last recension are frequent; and at the same time the internal marks of truth or error must be carefully considered.

(9) In the same way must we judge of readings in which the Western recension agrees with the Constantinopolitan against the Alexandrine.

(10) If any recension exhibits a reading varying from those of the others, it is not the number of individual witnesses, but the internal marks of goodness, on which the preference must be founded. No matter how few the witnesses, provided it can be shown that the reading was one in which all the old recensions originally agreed, and there be no special circumstances, arising from the character of the recensions, to weigh against it.

(11) It is to be remarked further, that the Alexandrine MSS. follow one recension in the Gospels, another in Paul's Epistles, and a third in the Acts and Catholic Epistles. The Vatican, in the former part of Matthew, agrees with the Western; in the last chs. and in the three other Evangelists, with the Alexandrine. In forming an opinion on the consent of testimonies, the critic should carefully attend to mixed MSS. of this kind.

lated into the languages spoken in the British Islands. Early in the Saxon times, we know that they were read in the vernacular tongue, through the translations of Adhelm, bishop of Sherborne (A. D. 706), Egbert, bishop of Lindisfern (A. D. 720), the venerable Bede (a few years subsequently), King Alfred (nearly 200 years later), and Elfric, archbishop of Canterbury (A. D. 993). There were, in addition to these translations, various glosses or commentaries upon detached portions of the Scriptures, in the vernacular tongue, and intended for common use.

3. About 1390, Wycliffe completed his translation of the Bible, which was very widely circulated, notwithstanding that copies had to be made by the tedious and expensive process of writing.

4. The favor in which this version was held excited the jealousy of the Romish clergy, who made various ineffectual attempts to suppress it. In 1408, Arundel, archbishop of York, ordained, in convocation, 'that no book or treatise composed by John Wycliffe, or by any other in his time, or hereafter to be composed, should be read by any one, unless approved by the universities, or, &c.,' 'under pain of being punished as a sower of schism, and a favorer of heresy.' This intolerant decree was followed by another, more severe in its prohibitions:—'That no one should, by his own authority, translate any text of Holy Scripture into English, or any other tongue, by way of book, libel, or treatise; and that no one should read any such book, libel, or treatise, now lately set forth in the time of John Wycliffe, or since, or hereafter to be composed, under pain of the greater excommunication, until the said translation should be approved by the diocesan of the place, or, if occasion require, by a provincial council.' He who disobeyed this order was to be treated and punished as a favorer of error and heresy.

5. The rigor of this decree was, however, inadequate wholly to repress that desire to read the sacred volume, which its circulation had created; and many persons were burnt for contumacy in reading out of Wycliffe's translation. In 1415, a law was passed, making it treason to read any of Wycliffe's books. All who were found guilty of so doing were to 'forfeit land, cattle, body, life, and goods, from their heirs forever, and so be condemned for heretics to God, enemies to the crown, and most arrant traitors to the land.'

6. It may readily be supposed, that, if these rigorous and cruel measures did not wholly suppress the reading of Wycliffe's version in private, they at least prevented any addition being made to the translations of the Scriptures already extant.

7. There is no doubt that Wycliffe made his translation from the Latin Vulgate, and not from the originals: its authority, therefore, is not of the highest kind.

8. The O. T. of Wycliffe's version has never yet been published. His N. T. has passed through two editions. The first was printed under the superintendence of the Rev. John Lewis, in 1731: the second was edited by the Rev. H. H. Baber, A. M., in 1810.

9. The progress of the reformation in Germany and England removed some of the impediments, at least for a time, that the Romanists had interposed in the way of biblical translations; and in 1526, the first edition of Tindal's translation of the N. T. was published at Antwerp. Its publication revived the fears and hatred of the Romish priests, and Bishop Tonstal was so intent upon its suppression, that he bought up all the copies that could be found, and committed them to the flames at Paul's Cross. Only one copy of this impression is known to be extant. It is very minutely described by Mr. Beloe, in his Anecdotes of Literature.*

10. The zeal of the bishop in this case outran his discretion; for the means he employed to suppress the translation of Tindal materially promoted the object its author had in view. The first edition, thus purchased up and destroyed, was very imperfectly executed; but the money expended by Tonstal in purchasing it up, enabled Tindal to publish a more correct and better printed edition, 3 or 4 years afterwards, in 1530; but, like its predecessor, it was, to a great extent, purchased and destroyed by the Romanists. Nothing daunted, however, Tindal completed a 3d edition, as also translations of the Pentateuch and Jonah; shortly after which he was seized in Flanders, strangled, and had his body reduced to ashes, A. D. 1536.

11. Various means were employed to stay the progress of Scripture reading and translation; but the work which Tindal had so nobly commenced went forward, and in 1535, Miles Coverdale, who had been one of Tindal's roadworkers, completed a tr. of the entire Bible.* It was published in a folio volume, and dedicated to Henry VIII., in a spirited Introduction, in which the author reproaches the self-willed and fiery monarch for having suffered his bishops to 'burne God's word, the root of faith, and to persecute the lovers and ministers of it.'

12. For this translation, which is said to have been Tindal's, as far onwards as 2 Chron. inclusive, the royal patronage was obtained during the same year in which Tindal died (A. D. 1536). The Lord Cromwell and Abp. Cramer prevailed upon the king to issue an order, that 'a book of the whole Bible should be provided and laid in the choir of every church for every man that would to look and read therein.'

13. The hand of persecution having been thus paralyzed, those inspired with a love of Scripture knowledge, and animated with a zeal for the advancement of the gospel, took advantage of the times, and various editions of the Bible followed each other in rapid succession. John Rogers, who subsequently became the first martyr in the reign of the sanguinary Mary, published, under the assumed name of Thomas Mathewes, an edition in 1537. In the following year, Johan Hallybushe printed the N. T. in Latin and English; and in 1540, the whole Bible was reprinted by Grafton and Whitchurch, with a preface written by Archbishop Cramer, whence it was called Cramer's Bible. After having been ordered by Henry VIII. to be set out and read in every parish church, this capricious prince, within two years afterwards, prohibited its use. In 1550, it received the royal favor of Edward VI., but subsequently shared the fate of the religion it was intended to elucidate. During the reign of this prince, several of these early editions of the Scriptures were reprinted, but no new translation was undertaken.

14. The persecution of the Protestants that took place in Mary's reign having compelled Bishop Coverdale, amongst others, to quit England, he took up his residence in Geneva, and there published a revised edition of the Bible, with notes. Of the Geneva Bible the N. T. appeared in 1557, and the entire Scriptures in 1560. Eight years subsequently (1568), an edition of the Bible, revised by a number of learned men, several of whom were bishops, presided over by Archbishop Parker, was published. From the official characters of those under whose superintendence it was prepared, this edition was called 'The Bishops' Bible.'

15. We have now enumerated the principal editions of the sacred writings that preceded the 'Authorized' English version now in common use. It must not be supposed, however, that these were so many new and independent translations. They were, in fact, only so many revisions of Tindal and Coverdale's version, with occasional insertions of the additions found in the Latin Vulgate, or in the Sept. version. The Geneva Bible purports to be a new translation from the originals; but there can be no doubt that its basis was the previous translation, and that it was only 'conferred diligently with the Greek,' as the editor, in one place, inadvertently admits.

16. To the general accuracy and excellence of Tindal and Coverdale's translation, all competent judges have borne the highest testimony. 'The violent opposition it met with,' says Geddes, a Roman Catholic and a stern critic, 'seems to have arisen more from the injurious reflections contained in the prologues and notes on the then established religion, than from any capital defects in the version itself. It was far from being a perfect translation, it is true; but it was the first of the kind, and few first translations will, I think, be found preferable to it. It is astonishing how little obsolete the language is even at this day; and in point of perspicuity, a noble simplicity, propriety of idiom, and purity of style, no English version has yet surpassed it. The envious of those who wrote against it are generally too severe, often captious, and sometimes evidently unjust.'

17. From the time at which the Bishops' Bible appeared, A. D. 1568, no translation or revision of the Scriptures of any importance seems to have been undertaken till 1604. At this period James I. took measures to procure the present 'Authorized' version. He nominated 54 learned men, chiefly professors and divines from the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, whom he charged with the task of 'retranslating, revising, or correcting' preceding versions, so as to produce as perfect a translation as possible.† Of the 54, however, only 47 actually engaged in the work, the others having died or declined the undertaking; or, as some think, they were appointed to be overseers of the rest.

1. There has been a good deal of controversy on the question, whether this edition of the Bible should be considered as a new and independent translation, or as only a revision of those versions which preceded it. If the directions (quoted in the note below) given by the king to those persons charged with the work may be deemed conclusive

* Vol. iii. pp. 52–57, cited in Carpenter's 'Guide to the Practical Reading of the Bible,' pp. 7–10. (Tindal's translation (ed. 1526) has just been republished (1837) at Andover, Mass. by J. B. Dabney, A. M.; with Tindal's life, and a collation of Matthew's Bible, Taverner's ed.; Coverdale's; Cramer's; the Geneva; and the Bishops' Bibles, the variations being noted in the margin. It is a very valuable book. Ed.)

† King James's directions to the English translators:— (1) 'The ordinary Bible read in the church, commonly called the Bishops' Bible, to be followed, and as little altered as the original will permit. (2) The names of the prophets and the holy writers, with the other names in the text, to be retained, as near as may be, according as they are vulgarly used. (3) The old ecclesiastical words to be kept; viz., as the word Church not to be translated Congregation, &c. (4) When any word hath divers significations, that to be kept which hath been most commonly used by the most eminent Fathers, being agreeable to the propriety of the place and the analogy of faith. (5) The division of the chapters to be altered either not at all or as little as may be, if necessity so require it. (6) No marginal notes at all to be affixed, but only for the explanation of the Hebrew or Greek words, which cannot, without some circumlocution, so briefly and fitly be expressed in the text. (7) Such quotations of places to be marginally set down as shall serve for the reference of one Scripture to another. (8) Every particular man of each company to take the same chapter or chapters; and, having translated or amended them severally by himself when he thinks good, all to meet together, confer what they have done, and agree for their part what shall stand. (9) If any one company hath despatched any one book in this manner, they shall send it to the rest, to be considered of seriously and judiciously; for His Majesty is very careful in this point. (10) If any one company, upon the review of the book so sent, shall doubt or differ upon any places, to send them word thereof, note the places, and themselves to send their reasons; to which if they consent not, the difference is to be compounded at the general meeting, which is to be of the chief persons of each company, at the end of the work. (11) When any place of special obscurity is doubted of, letters to be directed by authority, to send to say evidence on the subject, the question will be speedily settled.

2. And it is evident from the 'Translators' preface to the reader, in which they speak of 'building upon their foundation that went before,' of 'endeavoring to make that better which they left so good;' and—more conclusive still—in which they aver 'we never thought from the beginning that we should need to make a new translation, nor yet to make of a bad one a good one . . . but to make a good one better, or, out of many good ones, one principal good one, not justly to be excepted against; that hath been our endeavor, that our mark:—it is evident, from these expressions, that, although the translators of James did, with great care and diligence, consult and compare with the antecedent English versions the Heb. and Gr. texts of both Testaments, they did not, properly speaking, execute a new translation. It is equally obvious, however, from these passages, as well as from the text itself, that the version they completed was neither a servile copy of any previous version, nor 'a compilation of second-hand translations.' That they were laid under some restrictions cannot be denied, nor that their undertaking has sometimes suffered from them; but the nature and number of these are equally insignificant.

III. The critical value of the authorized English version of the Scriptures is a question of very grave importance, especially to those to whom this edition of the Bible is alone accessible. There has been some controversy as to the competency of James's translators to discharge the trust reposed in them, some writers having gone so far as to assert that there was not amongst them a single Heb. scholar, the Heb. language having been, in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., most shamefully neglected in our universities.* Nothing, however, can be farther from the truth than both of these statements.

1. In the time of Elizabeth, the oriental languages were amongst the ordinary philological studies at the two universities; and Fulke in particular speaks of many youths at Cambridge, in 1583, who were intimate with Heb. and Chaldee.† In the public schools, emulation in these studies was excited, as is exemplified in a notice of examinations at Merchant Tailors' school, in 1572, where the Bp. of Winchester 'tried the scholars in the Heb. Psalter.'‡ Among these scholars was the famous linguist, Dr. Lancelot Andrewes, who afterwards stood at the head of the list of James's translators. Of his associates we need only enumerate Dr. Adrian Saravia, who was a profound scholar, and tutor to the celebrated oriental critic, Nicholas Fuller; Dr. R. Clarke, who thoroughly understood the Heb., Gr., and Latin languages; Dr. Sayfield, to whose Heb. criticisms the learned and acute Gataker often refers with confidence, and whose 'kill in the Heb. tongue Minshew sought and acknowledged, when he published his valuable 'Guide into Tongues;' the profound orientalist, Mr. W. Bodwell, tutor to the eminent Dr. Pocock; Dr. John Rainolds, whose memory was so extraordinary that 'he could readily turn to all material passages in every volume, leaf, page, or paragraph, of the multitude of books he had read,' and who 'was most prodigiously seen in all kinds of learning, and most excellent in all tongues;' Drs. Holland, Kilby, Miles Smith, and Richard Brett, who have each left in their published works undoubted proofs of their critical skill in the Heb., Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, Gr., and Latin tongues; closing with Dr. John Bois,† that eminent light of learning,' who, at 5 years of age, had read the entire Bible, and before he was 6, 'could write Hebrew in an elegant hand, and who for ten years was chief Gr. lecturer in his college, besides reading lectures in Gr. at 4 in the morning in his own chamber;' and Sir Henry Saville, the celebrated editor of Chrysostom's works, in Gr., in 8 folio vols., and founder of the professorships of astronomy and geometry at Oxford. These were the qualifications of a few of James's translators, and it is but fair to presume that their associates could not have been vastly inferior to them in ancient learning and general knowledge.

2. But upon this question we are not reduced to the necessity of inferring the adequacy and excellence of the work from the qualifications of its conductors. Its character and quality are matters of fact, and therefore capable of examination and proof. Let us, then, glance at some of the testimonies that have been borne to these, by witnesses of unexceptionable character and competence.

3. In 1632 (i. e. 40 years after the publication of the authorized version, pub. in 1611), an order was made in the parliament, that a bill should be brought in for a new translation of the Bible into English. The project, however, slumbered for 4 years, till Bp. Walton had nearly completed the publication of his splendid Polyglot, when the grand committee for religion passed the following order:—

'That it be referred to a sub-committee to send for, and advise with, Dr. Walton, Mr. Hughes, Mr. Castle (Castell), Mr. Clark, Mr. Foulk, Dr. Cudworth, and such others as they shall think fit, and to consider of the translations and impressions of the Bible, and to offer their opinions therein to this committee.'

In pursuance of this order, the sub-committee, which was composed of some of the most learned men of the time, often met and consulted with others of great attainments in the oriental tongues. In these conferences were made 'divers excellent and learned observations of some mistakes in the translations of the Bible into English; which yet was agreed to be the best of any translation in the world.' Such is the narrative of the Lord Commissioner Whitlock, who had the care of the business, and who took great pains in the design, which became fruitless by the dissolution of the parliament. Johnson, in his account of the Eng. translations, relates, that the committee and their learned associates 'pretended to discover some mistakes in the last Eng. translation, which yet they allowed was the best extant.' This judgment, which was confirmed by Walton, personally, in the prolegomena to his Polyglot, was delivered at a time when the nation, as this profound scholar himself has told us, 'had more men of eminent skill in languages than ever heretofore.'

4. These testimonies, however, only refer to the comparative excellence of the Eng. Vulgate; something more positive and unqualified will add to their value. We select the following out of many entitled to equal weight:—

(1) Bp. Walton, in the Defence of his Polyglot Bible (p. 5), says that this translation 'may justly contend with any now extant in any other language in Europe.'

(2) Dr. Geddes, whose profound and various learning, and extensive acquaintance with biblical literature, entitle his judgment to great respect, while his peculiar theological opinions render his testimony the more independent, and therefore valuable, thus speaks of the authorized version:

'The means and the method employed to produce this translation promised something extremely satisfactory; and great expectations were formed from the united abilities of so many learned men, selected for the purpose, and excited to emulation by the encouragement of a munificent prince, who had declared himself the patron of the work. Accordingly, the highest eulogiums have been made on it, both by our own writers and by foreigners; and, indeed, if accuracy, fidelity, and the strictest attention to the letter of the text, be supposed to constitute the qualities of an excellent version, this, of all versions, must in general be accounted the most excellent. Every sentence, every word, every syllable, every letter and point, seem to have been weighed with the nicest exactitude, and expressed, either in the text or margin, with the greatest precision. Pagninus himself is hardly more literal; and it was well remarked by Robertson above 100 years ago, that it may serve for a lexicon of the Heb. language, as well as for a translation.'‡

(3) Dr. Adam Clarke's testimony is highly valuable. After having himself translated every word from the originals, which he made his constant study for more than half a century, and diligently collated the common printed text of the Eng. Bible with all the MSS. and collections from MSS. to which he could obtain access, he thus speaks of this version:—

'Those who have compared most of the European trs. with the original, have not scrupled to say, that the Eng. tr., made under the direction of James I., is the most accurate and faithful of the whole. Nor is this its only praise; the trs. have seized the very spirit and soul of the original, and expressed this almost every where with pathos and energy. . . . The original, from which it was taken, is alone superior to the Bible which was translated by the authority of King James. This is an opinion in which my heart, my judgment, and my conscience coincide.'§

(4) Dr. Doddridge says:—

'On a diligent comparison of our tr. with the original, we find that of the N. T., and I might also add that of the Old, in the main faithful and judicious. You know, indeed, that we do not scruple, on some occasions, to animadvert upon it; but you also know that these remarks affect not the fundamentals of religion, and seldom reach any farther than the beauty of a figure, or, at most, the connection of an argument.'||

(5) The late Rev. W. Orme, whose judgment was as sound as his learning was solid, thus speaks of the Eng. version:—

'Like every thing human, it is no doubt imperfect; but, as a tr. of the Bible, it has few rivals, and, as a whole, no superior. It is in general faithful, simple, and perspicuous. It has seized the spirit and copied the manner of the divine originals. It seldom descends to meanness or vulgarity; but often rises to elegance and sublimity. It is level to the understanding of the cottager, and fit to meet the eye of the critic, the poet, and the philosopher.'¶

5. Such, according to the most competent and independent judges, is the general excellence, the fidelity, and high literary qualities of the Eng. Vulgate. The testimony to this important fact cannot but be gratifying to those whose daily companion it is, and who constantly study its pages for religious instruction and comfort.

[6. An account of the biblical labors of a venerated friend, the Rev. J. HOMER, D. D., specially in reference to the sources of the common English version, will be seen in the Appendix A. at the end of pt. i. Ed.]

IV. We should not be dealing fairly with our subject, however, did we confine ourselves to an exhibition of the higher and more excellent qualities of the Eng. Bible, and put out of sight, or pass over in silence, the defects or other imperfections by which it is characterized. Our object is to give a faithful impression of its critical character and value; and this can only be done by an unreserved examination and statement of its faults as well as excellencies. The authorized version of the Bible having been made learned in the land for his judgment in such a place. (12) Letters to be sent from every bishop to the rest of his clergy, admonishing them of this translation in hand; and to move and charge as many as, being skilful in the tongues, have taken pains in that kind, to send his particular observations to the company, either at Westminster, Cambridge, or Oxford. (13) The directors in each company to be the deans of Westminster and Chester for that place; and the King's professors in Heb. and Gr. in each University. (14) These translations to be used when they agree better with the text than the Bishops' Bible itself; viz., Tindal's, Matthew's, Coverdale's, Whitchurch's, Geneva. (15) Besides the said directors before mentioned, three or four of the most ancient and grave divines in either of the Universities, not employed in translating, to be assigned by the Vice-Chancellor, upon conference with the rest of the heads, to be overseers of the translations, as well Heb. as Gr. for the better observation of the 4th rule, above specified. at a time when the critical apparatus for ascertaining and restoring the purity of the text of both the Heb. and Gr. Scriptures was very defective, it must partake, of course, in a very large degree, of those imperfections of which mention has already been made in Section V. But, independently of these imperfections, which belong to all the early versions in common, the following intrinsic and peculiar blemishes are observable in the English translation:—

1. There is a want of uniformity in the mode of translating—the absence of ‘an identity of phrasing,’ as the translators themselves call it, which greatly impairs its value. We give a few specimens, both in words and in phrases.

(1) Of Words. Passing over many others that may, perhaps, be deemed nearly synonymous, as fountain or spring; dwelling-place or habitation; shield or buckler; mitre, diadem, or hood; to wail, to mourn, or to lament;—we find the same word translated locust and grasshopper; wormwood and hemlock; lintel and door-post; oel and ostrich; nettle and thorn; hell and the grave; cor-morant and pelican; law, statute, decree, and ordinance; coat of mail, habergeon, and breastplate; a fort, hold, strong hold, castle, munition, and bulwark; vessels, furniture, instruments; stuff, armor, and weapons; nations, Gentiles, and heathens; a pattern, likeness, form, similitude, and figure; heaven, heavens, the heavens, and air. This is calculated to embarrass and perplex the reader.

(2) Of Sentences. There is a diversity in the rendering of these, especially in the use of idiomatic phrases in the Heb., in which the translators appear to have been guided by no uniform principle, nor even by any rules of grammatical analogy. ‘To lift up one’s feet,’ ‘to remove,’ is certainly not a more harsh idiom than ‘to lift up one’s eyes,’ for ‘to look up,’ yet they everywhere retain the latter Hebraism; never the former. In like manner, ‘to deliver one’s self from the eyes of another,’ for ‘to escape from one,’ is not more abhorrent from our idiom than ‘to hide one’s eyes from another,’ for ‘to connive at him;’ yet, in the former case, our translators rejected the Hebraism in 2 Sam. 20:6, but in the latter retained it, in Lev. 20:4. ‘To do what is good in one’s eyes,’ is a Hebraism which they have generally rendered by ‘doing what pleaseth or liketh one,’ Gen. 16:6. Est. 8:8. But in a phrase exactly similar (Jud. 17:6), they translate, ‘Every one did that which was right in his own eyes.’ Again, in Gen. 41:37, they say, ‘And the thing was good in the eyes of Pharaoh;’ but in Nu. 11:10, they have not translated, ‘It was also evil in the eyes of Moses,’ but ‘Moses was also displeased.’ But there are no phrases in the rendering of which our translators have shown more variety than in those in which the words ben and aisch make a part. The former of these, which primarily signifies a son, and secondarily a descendant of any kind, has in the oriental dialects a much wider acceptance, and is applied, not only to the offspring of the animal creation, but also to productions of every sort; and what is still more catachrestical, even to consequential or concomitant relations; so that an arrow is called ‘the son of the bow;’ the morning star, ‘the son of the morning;’ threshed-out corn, ‘the son of the floor;’ and anointed persons, ‘the sons of oil.’ In rendering such phrases as these, our translators have generally softened the Hebraism, but after no uniform manner. ‘Sons of Belial’ is surely not more intelligible to an English reader, than ‘sons of oil,’ and much less so than ‘sons of valor,’ ‘sons of righteousness,’ ‘sons of iniquity;’ yet, while they retain the first Hebraism, with all its original harshness, and partly in its original form, they mollify the last three into ‘valiant men,’ ‘righteous men,’ ‘wicked men.’ Nay, even in the retention of the Hebraism in the first case, they are not consistent. If once they admitted the word Belial, they should have retained it, as Goddes remarks, throughout; and said, ‘a thing of Belial,’ ‘a heart of Belial,’ ‘a witness of Belial,’ ‘the floods of Belial;’ which, however, they render, ‘an evil disease,’ ‘a wicked heart,’ ‘an ungodly witness,’ ‘the floods of ungodliness.’

(3) Not only in similar phrases have our translators broken the rules of uniformity, but they have often violated them in rendering the same phrase, and that sometimes in the same chapter. ‘How old art thou?’ says Pharaoh to Jacob (Ge. 47:8), instead of, ‘How many are the days of thy years?’ But in Jacob’s answer (v. 9) we have, ‘The days of the years of my pilgrimage are,’ &c. In v. 28, they again drop the Hebraism, and translate, ‘So the whole age of Jacob,’ for, ‘all the days of the years of Jacob.’

(4) Many additional instances of this variety of phrasing might be given; but we have cited enough to show that the Eng. translators were not guided by any uniform rule or fixed principle, especially in dealing with the Hebraisms; and, moreover, that this want of uniformity must [occasionally] produce some inconvenience to the reader of the Eng. Bible.

2. The anxiety of the trs. to render the original literally, has sometimes induced them to adopt modes of expression incompatible with the idiom of our language. True, the language they have employed has become so familiar to our ears, by being the language of the national church, that it is in no way offensive to our feelings; but it has been justly remarked, that a proof of many of the Bible expressions being neither natural nor analogous, is seen in the fact, that they have never yet been able to force themselves into common usage, even in conversation. Any person who should employ them in his discourse, would be supposed to jeer at Scripture, or to affect the language of fanaticism. In short, what Selden said of the authorized version is strictly just; namely, that it is translated into English words, rather than into English phrase.

3. We have now enumerated the principal defects by which the otherwise preeminently faithful and felicitous text of the ‘Authorized Version’ of the Bible is marred. It is gratifying to the devout mind to perceive that their united amount does not in any degree interfere with Christian doctrine or duty. They resolve themselves almost wholly into matters of literary propriety; and in the worst cases, do no more than leave the reader in a state of doubt as to the precise meaning of some local or historical reference.

SECTION VII.

DIVISIONS AND ARRANGEMENTS OF THE SCRIPTURES.

Ancient and Modern Distribution of the Biblical Books.—Original form of the Text; Chapters and Verses; Punctuation.—Advantages and Disadvantages of our Present Divisions of the Sacred Text.

1. THE BIBLE.—a word denoting THE BOOK, and applied to the Scriptures by way of eminence or distinction, is divided into two principal parts: THE OLD TESTAMENT, and THE NEW TESTAMENT; the former comprising those books that were written antecedently to the birth of our Savior; the latter embracing those writings that narrate his history and expound his doctrines.

1. THE OLD TESTAMENT resolves itself into two great divisions; the Canonical Books and the Apocryphal Books: the former were written by persons under the influence of divine inspiration, are a part of the rule of faith and conduct of all believers, and have ever been undisputed in the church, as regards their authority; the latter are of no divine authority; but some of them are highly valuable as historical documents; particularly the two books of the Maccabees, which help to fill up the history of the interval of time that elapsed between the sealing up of prophecy and the advent of the Messiah. It is to be regretted that some of the other apocryphal books contain gross perversions of truth, and details of an indelicate nature.

2. The Jewish church divided the canonical books into three classes, under which form they were generally referred to and quoted: THE LAW, THE PROPHETS, and the HAGIOGRAPH, or holy writings. THE LAW contained the five books of Moses; frequently called the Pentateuch, i.e. the five Books. THE PROPHETS comprised the whole of the writings now termed prophetic—from Isaiah to Malachi, inclusive; and also the books of Job, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther; these books having been either written or revised by prophets—probably the former. THE HAGIOGRAPH included the Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon. It is thought that our Savior recognized this division of the sacred books. Lu. 24:44.

3. The books of THE NEW TESTAMENT are divisible into three classes—HISTORICAL, DOCTRINAL, and PROPHETICAL. The first embraces the four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles; the second includes the Apostolic Epistles; and the third, the Book of Revelation. We do not mean, however, that either of these classes excludes the subject of the other; like all the rest of the sacred books, those of the New Testament are of a mixed nature; each one containing something of history, prophecy, and doctrine.

(1) In the second and third centuries, the New Testament was divided into two parts—the Gospels and the Epistles, or Gospels and Apostles. Other divisions have been made in subsequent ages, but it is unnecessary to trouble the reader with a description of them.

(2) THE NEW TESTAMENT is called in the Greek, Η ΚΑΙΝΗ ΔΙΑΘΗΚΗ, the New Testament or Covenant, a title that was early borrowed by the church from the Scriptures (Mat. 26:28. Gal. 3:17. Heb. 8:9:15,20). and authorized by the apostle Paul, 2 Cor. 3:14. The word ΔΙΑΘΗΚΗ, in these passages, denotes a covenant; and in this view, THE NEW COVENANT signifies, ‘A book containing the terms of the new covenant between God and man.’ But, according to the meaning of the primitive church, which adopted this title, it is not altogether improperly rendered NEW TESTAMENT; as being that in which the Christian’s inheritance is sealed to him as a son and heir of God, and in which the death of Christ as a testator (Heb. 9:16,17) is related at large, and applied to our benefit. As this title implies, that in the gospel unspeakable gifts are given or bequeathed to us, the title of TESTAMENT may be retained, though that of COVENANT is more exact and proper.

(3) The term GOSPEL, which is more generally applied to the writings of the four Evangelists, comprising a history of the transactions of our Lord Jesus Christ, is not unfrequently used in a more extended sense, as including the whole of the New Testament Scriptures, and also that system of grace and mercy which they unfold. This word, which exactly answers to the Greek term Ευαγγελιον, is derived from the Saxo words, God (good) and spel (speech or tidings), and is evidently intended to denote the good message, or the ‘glad tidings of great joy;’ which God has sent to all mankind, ‘preaching peace by Jesus Christ, who is Lord of all.’ Ac. 10:36.

(4) Concerning the chronological order of the New Testament books, biblical writers are not agreed. The following table is compiled from Townsend’s Chronological Arrangement, where the conflicting opinions of chronologists have been considered and decided on with great care and judgment:

4. That all the books which convey to us the history of events under the New Testament were written and immediately published by persons contemporary with the events, is most fully proved by the testimony of an unbroken series of authors, reaching from the days of the Evangelists to the present times; by the concurrent belief of Christians of all denominations; and by the unreserved confession of avowed enemies to the gospel. — In this point of view the writings of the ancient Fathers of the Christian church are invaluable. They contain, not only frequent references and allusions to the books of the New Testament, but also such numerous professed quotations from them, that it is demonstrably certain, that these books existed in their present state a few years after the conclusion of our Savior's ministry. But this is not the place to enlarge upon this topic; it will be fully treated of in a subsequent Part.

II. From what has now been said, it will be perceived, that the existing arrangement of the sacred books has been made with a view to their subject matter, rather than with reference to their historical connection; the order of the parts of each division being determined either by the relative importance of the matters to which they relate, the comparative consideration of the persons to whom they are addressed, or some other incidental circumstance of a similar kind. This arrangement, which is adopted in most of the modern versions of the Bible, was originally borrowed, with some trifling exceptions, from the Latin Vulgate, as settled at the council of Trent. It possesses some advantages for reference and consultation; but it should not govern the student in his Scripture studies, in which the natural order of history and chronology should be generally adhered to. He who has thus studied the Bible, will readily subscribe to the remark of the erudite Lightfoot, who says, 'Such a method is the most satisfactory, delightful, and confirmative of the understanding, mind, and memory, that may be.' This settles histories in your mind; this brings the things as if done before your eyes; this makes you mark what else you would not; and this suffers you not to slip over the least title of a word; and sometimes, in things of doubt and scruple, this strikes all out of question.*

III. 1. The sacred writings had originally, and for a long period of time, no punctuation, nor any such divisions as those of chapter and verse. The words were not so much as separated by intervals from one another. Letter was strung on to letter, and so continued, that every line was like a single word. Hence the reader was obliged first to separate and re-combine the letters, in order to form words and discover the sense. So late even as the fifth century, the New Testament had none of the ordinary marks of distinction, although Christendom had no lack of grammarians, who might have here found an undertaking worthy of their art. The following passage will give the uninformed reader some idea, though a very inadequate one, of the continuous form of the original text, and of the misconceptions to which it was liable:

NOW WHEN HE HAD ENDED ALL HIS SAYING
SIN THE AUDIENCE OF THE PEOPLE HE WENT
RED INTO CAPERNAUM AND CERTAINLY, &c.†

2. It was no easy task for a person not long instructed, or very much used to it, to read the Bible well and intelligibly, in the public assemblies, without adopting for his guide some marks of distinction; for private reading, also, assistance of a similar description was a desideratum. Hence arose the Masoretic punctuation of the Hebrew text, and the Euthalian divisions in the Greek text. The date of the former is as far back as the days of Ezra, while others maintain that it was unknown before the second century of the Christian era. The divisions made by Euthalius, in the fifth century, were very different from those now made by the usual points, or grammatical stops, and consisted in setting just so many words in one line as were to be read uninterruptedly, so as clearly to disclose the sense of the author. Hug has given a specimen of these stichometrical divisions, as they are called, out of a celebrated fragment of Paul's epistles, which Wetstein has marked H. The passage is Ti. 2.3. We give it in English, however, instead of Greek, for the sake of the unlearned:

THAT THE AGED MEN BE SOBER
TEMPERATE
SOUND IN FAITH
IN LOVE
THE AGED WOMEN LIKEWISE
IN BEHAVIOR AS BECOMETH HOLINESS
NOT FALSE ACCUSERS
NOT GIVEN TO MUCH WINE
TEACHERS OF GOOD THINGS

It is clear that this mode of writing occupied a very large space, to no good purpose, and copyists soon began to improve upon the system, by running on the stichoi or lines, and separating each one by the introduction of a point. The grammarians, however, at length took offence at a mode of punctuation so entirely ungrammatical, and began to introduce distinctions according to fixed rules. This was gradually improved, but did not arrive at any thing like perfection, until very long after the invention of printing.

3. Previous to the introduction of these verbal divisions into the sacred text, there existed other and larger divisions, adopted for the purposes of reference and worship.

4. It appears from the references in the New Testament to the Book of Psalms, that they were at that time, and most likely had always been, divided into distinct odes or songs, as we now possess them. But with the rest of the Hebrew Scriptures it was different. These were divided, for the convenience of reading, into sections, called Parashim and Haptharoth; the former comprising the law; the latter, the prophets. As these divisions were made for the service of the synagogue, each division included fifty-three Parashim or Haptharoth, so that, by reading one of each on the several Sabbaths, the entire Scriptures were publicly read through in the course of the year. But, in addition to these larger sections, the Parashim were distributed into Siderim, or orders; and the whole divided into Pesukim, or verses, by means of two great points (:) called soph-pasuk.

5. The custom of reading the New Testament publicly in the Christian assemblies would, of course, soon suggest the propriety of some such divisions being made in this as had already been introduced into the Jewish Scriptures. This, in fact, took place. At a very early period, a division was made of the text into church lessons. The books thus divided were called lectionaries, and the sections themselves, titles and chapters. In the lectionaries there were other distinctions, of great use, for the purposes of comparison and quotation. The author of these sections, in the Gospels, is supposed to have been Ammonius, of Alexandria, whence they derived the name of Ammonian sections; those in the Acts of the Apostles, and in the Epistles, were introduced by Euthalius, of whom we have already spoken.†

6. The inventor of our present chapters was Cardinal Hugo, who flourished about 1240. Having projected an alphabetical index of all the words and phrases in the Latin Vulgate, Hugo found it necessary, in order to facilitate references to the text, to divide it into distinct sections, which were substantially the same as the chapters now commonly adopted. Instead of subdividing the chapters into verses, however, he effected a secondary division, by placing in the margin, at an equal distance from each other, according to the length of the chapters, the first seven letters of the alphabet, or as many of them as the length of the chapters would admit of. Towards the middle of the fifteenth century, Rabbi Nathan, a learned Jew, undertook to provide for the Hebrew Scriptures a Concordance, similar to that which Cardinal Hugo had completed for the Latin Vulgate. But although he followed Hugo in his division of the text into chapters, he improved upon the Cardinal's subdivision, by numbering in the margin every pasuk or verse.

7. The first editor of the Old Testament who enumerated the verses by subjoining to each verse a figure, according to our present method, was Athias, a Jew of Amsterdam, who, in the years 1661 and 1667, published two very correct editions of the Hebrew Bible, having the verses distinguished in this manner. His plan was followed by Vatablus, in an edition of the Latin Bible printed for him by Stephens, and has since been adopted in most editions of the Scriptures. The division of the New Testament into verses is attributed to Robert Stephens, who is said to have done it during a journey from Paris to Lyons, about the middle of the sixteenth century.

IV. We have now noticed all the divisions and notes of distinction occurring in the sacred writings. They form, as the reader has seen, no part of the original text, but are mere human contrivances, adopted for the purpose of facilitating references to the text,

* Townsend's Chronological Arrangement of the Bible should be the universal study Bible. (This arrangement is given in the Comp. Comm. under the head 'Sacred Chronicle'; see our 'General Index.' Townsend's work is now (1837, 1838) republished entire in the United States. Ed.

and of aiding our conceptions of its sense. That they are of great utility is undoubted; but it cannot be denied, that they are sometimes attended with serious inconvenience and evil.

1. The punctuation is often very faulty. In some of the early printed editions the points seem to have been put in almost at random, and even in the present Greek text, as well as in the English version, the sense and beauty of many passages are marred by injudicious and inaccurate punctuation. The misplacing of a comma will not unfrequently alter the sense of a passage; and the improper insertion of a full stop or a note of interrogation must, it is evident, be still more subversive of its real sense or meaning. Hence it is plain, that we should not blindly follow and adopt the decisions of those to whom we are indebted for the punctuation of the text: our own judgment and understanding should be employed; and where a passage appears to be obscure or difficult, we may with propriety substitute such a mode of punctuation as will render it perspicuous and intelligible. To do this with propriety will, of course, demand attention to the laws of criticism and interpretation.

2. The inconvenience attendant upon our divisions into chapters and verses is, that the sense is often interrupted, and sometimes destroyed, by the disjoining of what ought to be connected, and the connecting of what ought to be disjoined. The division of the chapters is frequently improper, but that of the verses is often much more so. There is in many places a full periodical distinction where there should not be so much as the smallest pause. Nominatives are separated from their verbs, adjectives from their substantives, and even letters and syllables are cruelly divorced from the words to which they naturally belong. By these means the chain of reasoning is broken, the sentences mangled, the eye misguided, the attention bewildered, and the meaning lost.

3. But independently of these evils, the divisions both of chapter and verse often exert an unfavorable influence on the attention, and induce, almost unconsciously to the reader, an idea of completion, or the contrary, very unfavorable to an accurate perception of the meaning of the sacred writings. Most persons are in the constant habit of reading the Bible in separate chapters, one or more at a time, without any regard to the continuity of the subject, or the completion of the sense. It sometimes happens, that in reading the epistles, the opening of an argument is read on one day, its proofs and illustrations on the next, and its inferences and application on the third or a more distant day still. The consequence of this may be easily conceived. No person thus reading the Scriptures can ever enter thoroughly into the sense and spirit of the sacred penmen, or duly appreciate the powers of argument and illustration they frequently exhibit in the prosecution of their high object. For the purposes of study, a Bible with an unbroken text, or divided only into sections, according to the real divisions of the subjects, having an enumeration of the verses in the margin, is greatly to be desiderated.* If this is not to be had, the student should be constantly upon his guard against the evils to which we have adverted.†

CHAPTER III.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION.

THE object of criticism is the genuineness and purity of the text; the object of interpretation is the sense of the text:—the one is conversant with the mere letter of Scripture; the other, with its import.‡ It is the province of criticism to ascertain what an author wrote; of interpretation, to determine what he meant. This distinction is of great importance, and almost indispensable to a luminous view of the subject in its several details. Like every other science, this has its natural boundaries and divisions, and it is only by a clear perception of, and rigid adherence to, these, that order will be introduced into study, and the mind be preserved from confusion.

SECTION I.

DIFFICULTIES.

Sources of Biblical Difficulties.—Advantages derivable from an Acquaintance with the Principles of Interpretation.—Commentaries on the Bible.—Evils arising from the too early Use of them.—Suggestions for studying the Scriptures.

I. It would be unwise, as well as unjust, to attempt to conceal from the novice the numerous difficulties he will have to encounter in the interpretation of the Scriptures, and the large amount of labor he will be called upon to expend in his efforts to remove them. For a person to remain ignorant of these facts, is to be exposed to the constant danger of resting satisfied with the mere dicta of others, instead of applying at once to the source of scriptural knowledge, for the discovery of those truths, upon the immediate perception and personal appropriation of which depend his personal safety and happiness. Let us at once premise, therefore, that in the interpretation of the Bible we have to encounter difficulties of no ordinary magnitude, and such we shall show as will call forth all the energies of the mind.

1. In discussing the object and principles of biblical interpretation, we must view the Scripture in its most simple and obvious character; i. e. as a literary document, of properties in common with every other such work, but having some peculiar to itself.

2. In the first place, it must be recollected, that the Bible is composed of a number of separate and independent writings or books indited by different persons, unknown to each other, living in different places, and at different periods of time, and treating on the subjects of which they wrote in a great variety of style; the last-mentioned fact arising out of the mutability of human language, [variety of human character], and other facts, to which we shall presently advert. Now, as all human languages are composed of arbitrary signs, between which and the ideas they are intended to represent there is no real analogy or connection, these difficulties may be easily conceived. Issuing in different ways from their common source, they become apparent in the simple radical meaning of terms, or in the changes induced upon that meaning by the metaphorical application of them; by idiomatic expressions, by peculiarities of style, by difference of subject, and by the different species of composition in which the same subject is treated.§

3. But, in addition to these difficulties, there are others equally embarrassing. We are not only far removed from the authors of the Bible by distance of time, in consequence of which we have to contend with the difficulties inseparable from written language, in a greater degree than otherwise we should have to do, but we are separated from them, also, by distance of place and circumstance. Their laws, manners, customs, and modes of thinking, were very dissimilar to every thing with which we are now conversant; and their references and allusions to then existing circumstances are sometimes so slight, but so intimately connected with an argument or an illustration, as to call for a large measure of previous information and knowledge, on the part of their readers. [See pref. to Bush's Illustr.]

4. It is not, however, intended to affirm that the Scriptures are so obscure, and their meaning so difficult to be ascertained, that multitudes of persons in whose hands they are placed must be deprived of the advantages they tender, and remain destitute of all interest in those blessings it was the great design of their divine Author to communicate. By no means. Those great truths of revelation upon which man's faith and salvation depend, are conveyed in language too intelligible to be mistaken by any humble and teachable mind, however destitute of adventitious knowledge. What we wish to impress upon the reader's mind is this, that there is in the sacred writings much beyond what is indispensable to salvation, which it is desirable to know and to understand; that there are heights and depths of knowledge, the discovery and comprehension of which will greatly conduce to our moral, intellectual, and religious perfection. The more we discover of the beauties of Scripture composition, and of the harmony and symmetry of divine truth, the more the heart will be expanded in love to God, and the more will the energies of the mind be directed to the attainment of his great purposes in the revelation of his will.

5. Our purpose is, to place the nature of those studies comprehended within the science of Scripture interpretation in such a light, as to fortify the mind of the student against those feelings of despondency to which it could not fail to be subjected, upon encountering difficulties of which it had previously no conception. Let these be in some degree foreseen and understood, and a moderate amount of diligence and perseverance be brought to the subject, and we may safely promise the student a rich harvest of reward. If he do not speedily become a profound critic himself, he will become so far acquainted with the principles of interpretation as to be capable of forming a sound judgment upon the criticisms and interpretations

* (1) Wesley's Testament may be most advantageously used by the student. The verses are to be found in the margin, and the subjects are generally divided into paragraphs. (2) 'Dr. J. A. Bengel, in whom were united the deepest piety with the most extensive learning, is author' (says Dr. A. Clarke) 'of an edition of the Gr. N. T., with various readings, and such a judicious division of it into paragraphs, as has never been equalled, and perhaps never can be excelled.' (3) A 'Revised Testament' was published, anonymously, in Boston, in 1824, 'divided into paragraphs, [on the basis of Knapp,] the punctuation in many cases altered, and some words not in the original, expunged.' (4) Rev. Dr. Colt pub., in 1834, a beautiful and critical Bible, divided into paragraphs, &c. the vs. in marg. (5) Rev. Mr. Nourse, of Philad., edited a very neat Paragraph Bible, the common text unaltered, pub. in 1837, by Perkins & Marvin, Boston. (6) The same publishers have also done great service to the cause of biblical literature, by reprinting, at one third the foreign price, and yet in an elegant manner, the very valuable Bible of Townsend; being 'The O. and N. T. arranged in Historical and Chronological Order, with copious Notes, by the Rev. G. Townsend, M. A.; the whole revised, divided into paragraphs, punctuated according to the best critical texts, the italic words reexamined, passages and words of doubtful authority marked, a choice and copious selection of parallel passages given, &c. by the Rev. T. W. Colt, D. D. Pres. of Transylv. Univ.—Boston and Philadelphia, 1837, 1838.—Ed.]

‡ The science explaining the rules of interpretation is called sacred Hermeneutics, which, when marked as a part of theology, is called exegesis, or Exegetical Theology. From this is distinguished what is called criticism, the art itself of interpreting the sacred volume. Seiler says, 'Hermeneutics, which is employed in the discovery and explanation of the sense of a speech or writing, is, objectively considered, a collection of rules, through the application of which the sense of the speech or writing is found, and accurately expressed. Subjectively considered, it is the knowledge and expression of that sense. This ability, obtained by exercise in explaining according to rules, constitutes an interpreter. The individual who, without the aid of fixed rules, but by the practice of reading and reflection reth. has learned to explain the Bible, is an empirical interpreter. Hermeneutics is, then, the theory of interpretation—exegesis is the practice. Both are included under the name of Exegetical Theology.'—Bib. Herm. pp. 25, 26.

of others, and of reading the Scriptures with pleasure and advantage to himself.

II. This seems the proper place for a few observations upon the use of commentaries and expositions of the Bible; because those persons who are contented to remain ignorant of the elementary principles of biblical interpretation, on the ground of the difficulty with which such knowledge is to be attained, are necessitated to betake themselves, in their Scripture reading, to the constant use of expositors—if they do not, as we fear is often the case, substitute these for the text itself.

1. Let us suppose a person about to commence a course of Scripture reading, with a view to his personal edification, and who is, therefore, desirous to comprehend the meaning of the Bible to at least the same extent as he would any human composition. He is, however, supposed to be almost totally ignorant of those historical matters to which the sacred writers so frequently allude, and which, in fact, give a character to the whole of their communications; of those common principles of literary composition by which every judicious and correct writer is governed in the construction of his work; of those general laws of our nature, which, under the various circumstances of life, govern the human mind; and of those peculiarities of time and circumstance, which, of necessity, characterize every work of antiquity. But, if he is ignorant on these matters, can he be capable of forming a right judgment on the contents of the sacred volume? Assuredly not; and it is because he has a consciousness of this inability to judge for himself, that he adopts a commentator as his infallible guide. Can any thing be more preposterous, however, than such a mode of proceeding? Can any thing tend more effectually to shut out the light of heaven, and perpetuate those lamentable differences which exist among men who profess to take the same word as the ground of their faith, while each stands at antipodes with the rest? Let us ask, How is it impossible that persons thus implicitly adopting the judgment of others should have any judgment of their own? We have as many descriptions of commentaries as we have shades of religious belief; and every exposition of Scripture is written in accordance with some system of religious opinion, which it is designed to support and recommend. Now, if a commentary be adopted as a guide, by a person who has not studied the Scriptures for himself, and who is therefore incompetent to decide on the justness of the interpretations proposed, it is clear that he is wholly at the mercy of his expounder, and will, in every thing, be disposed to adopt his explications and solutions. Thus it is, that, instead of a Bible Christian, he is made a sectarian; and his faith, instead of being founded on the word of God, is built on the speculations of men. His vacant mind, like what the lawyers call a derelictum, is claimed in property by the first occupant; and, as Dr. Campbell has justly remarked, that author, and others of the same party, commonly keep possession ever after. To the standard set up by them, every passage in Scripture must be made conformable, no matter what violence it requires; and by the same standard all other authors and interpreters must be pronounced good or bad, orthodox or heterodox. An opinion is first formed of the sense of Scripture, and a [freed, or] system of doctrine is adopted, and the Bible is then resorted to for arguments to support and defend them; with what success we need not say. Is it surprising that infidelity should exist and triumph, when it is found that sects the most opposite, and principles the most discordant, are supported by an appeal to the same Scriptures?

2. The sacred writings are given to mankind for the discovery of truths which human reason could never have discovered, and can now only apprehend in so far as they are herein revealed. But is this object likely to be answered, if persons go to the reading of the Scriptures under the circumstances to which we have now adverted? By adopting these human expositions, they go to the Bible with the most inveterate prejudices and prepossessions; they take it for granted, before even looking into its pages, that such and such is the religion it propounds, and their only object in reading it—whether conscious of the fact or otherwise—is to accommodate it to their notions, and adapt it to the support of their previously-formed system.* Being predetermined in favor of certain notions, before they read the pages of inspiration, passages of Scripture are strained, and tortured, and darkened, by unnatural comments, because they are read, not to find out the sense, but to make them speak that sense which had been previously imposed upon them.† The result may be readily conceived. The Scriptures are to such a person a sealed book; he understands them not, but as they are meted out to him by his spiritual guides: where these fail, he also must fail; where these misinterpret the language of the Bible, he, of necessity, must adopt, if not that which is really false, yet that which has no foundation in the words upon the supposed testimony of which he receives and adopts it. But, what is worse than this, such a person is displacing the word of God, by the substitution of human compositions; good in themselves, perhaps, but still human, and therefore unauthoritative compositions. Should they be faultless,—a thing inconceivable,—he will then only be guilty of having preferred the report of a man—one who, it is admitted, would not willingly deceive him, but who is himself open to deception—of having preferred the report of an erring creature, to the direct and actual communications of God himself! This will be the extent of the evil,—no trifling one, surely,—even if there should be nothing defective or erroneous in the character of those compositions thus substituted for the Bible. How, then, if they be absolutely false and erroneous!

3. In every point of view, therefore, the [too] early use of these works is prejudicial to the mind. They have a necessary tendency to prevent the exercise of the judgment and the discursive faculty; the person who takes them as his guides is ever learning, and never comes to a knowledge of the truth; he is confined within the limits which his teacher prescribes, and, in most cases, is unacquainted with the grounds on which his opinions are formed. To the advanced student, such works have their use, and by him they may be consulted with advantage. Having made some progress in scriptural science, he is provided with the principles by which their pretensions are to be tried; having acquired some insight into the spirit and sentiments of holy writ, he is capable of forming a judgment of the conformity or contrariety of these authors to that infallible standard; and therefore their authority or value is not likely to be over-estimated, while all the advantages they furnish will be effectually secured.‡ The theologian, then, ought to commence his studies with the principles of interpretation, so that he may apply them for himself, that the decisions of inspiration alone may control his judgment.

SECTION II.

HISTORY OF BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION.

Primitive Hebrew Interpreters—Vicious Modes of Interpretation—Early Christian Interpreters—Allegorical and Scholastic Systems of Interpretation—Revival of Biblical Learning—Hermeneutical Writers.

1. From the origin of the Hebrew state down to the time of its destruction, the sacred books required little interpretation: their language was, during all this period, vernacular to the Israelites, and underwent only slight changes. If, then, any explanation was required, it was only in reference to the duties prescribed by the Mosaic law; and to be made by the Levites and Prophets, appointed by the Mosaic constitution, as were the interpreters and teachers of the divine laws, both sacred and civil, to the people. De. 33:10. They promoted the internal worship and the sincere veneration of the one God, and prompt obedience to his laws; and they inculcated the love of true piety and virtue, agreeably to the object of the Mosaic constitution, on their countrymen. From the time of Samuel downwards, therefore, they had schools in which the youth were formed to those noble sentiments, and in which, with the same view, the Scriptures were read and explained.

2. Although, previous to their exile to Babylon, the Israelites had among them persons who, from the nature of their office, applied themselves to the understanding of the Mosaic books, and to explaining them in the manner suited to the wants of the time; yet, by the greater part of the community, the study of these and the other sacred books was in general little heeded, [indeed, they seem to have been so neglected as to have been for a time lost, 2 K. 22:8—13]; for the Israelites universally showed a great propensity to the worship of idols and false gods at all times; until, by the condign punishment of their perverseness, in the destruction of their state and subsequent exile, they were brought to a better mind.

3. When the Jews, after their return home, began to devote themselves with much greater care than ever before to their religion, and in consequence to the study of those books in which it was contained; the more distant they were from that age in which particularly the more ancient of these books were composed; and the more the language of their fathers had become depraved among them; so much the more every day did the necessity of having them explained to them become greater. But, growing more and more adverse to all foreign religions, they by degrees fell into the basest superstition, and thus became attached to those modes of interpretation which are particularly pleasing to the [external,] superstitious, [superficial,] trifling, and narrow-minded. Before the time of our Savior, there had, in consequence, long prevailed a trifling and subtle mode of explaining the O. T., which, servilely adhering to the words, altogether departed from the true meaning of the text,—a mode which was followed by most of the doctors of the Pharisaical sect, particularly in interpreting the laws of Moses contrary to their spirit, and the divine intention in enacting them.

4. But, at the same time, there were not a few who followed a quite opposite plan, and paid no attention to the proper and common meaning of the words, but superintended on the Scriptures a remote and figurative or allegorical signification, with the view of extracting from them the tenets of a foreign philosophy. The most indefatigable in this absurd manner of interpretation was Philo-Judæus, who was so carried away by his attachment to the Platonic philosophy, as to

* Selden says, "We pick out a text here and there, to make it serve our turn; whereas, if we take it altogether, and consider what went before, and what followed after, we should find it meant no such thing." (TABLE TALK, article BIBLE.) The practice here condemned, 300 years since, is still the prevalent in the Christian world.

† Stillinger quotes it as the declaration of Socinus (de Servat. l. iii. 6.) That if our doctrine 'were not only once, but frequently mentioned in Scripture, yet he would not therefore believe the thing to be so as we suppose.' For, said he, 'seeing the thing itself cannot be, I take the least inconvenient interpretation of the words; and draw forth such a sense from them as is most consistent with itself and the tenor of the Scripture.' Can we be at all conversant with the theological writings of our own time, and yet deny that many who would start with horror at the idea of being charged with the least approach towards the sentiments of Socinus, do, in truth, imitate too closely the method he adopted, to support and give currency to those sentiments?

‡ Ernesti judiciously recommends the student to fix upon some one, or at most two, of the most celebrated interpreters of Scripture, and those which are designated grammatical, because the true sense of the subject must be derived from the true signification of words. Having fixed upon the commentators he intends to use, the student ought, by the repeated and careful perusal of them, to form himself by degrees to their manner of reasoning. While thus occupied, he ought only occasionally, or of necessity, to consult other commentators.

5. From the time of Alexander the Great, there evidently prevailed among the Jews who lived in Egypt a most silly mode of interpretation, deriving its origin from the allegorical method of the secret philosophers of the Egyptians, which, in the course of time, propagated itself more extensively. Out of the words and letters themselves, and their order and transposition, they extracted a hidden sense, and doctrines full of mystery; and this manner of interpretation, which was thought to recommend the traditions received from their ancestors by the additional authority of sanctity and of divine origin, came at last to be termed cabbalistical, from the word qbl, which signifies 'to receive.'

6. When, however, from the 10th century after Christ, the study of Heb. grammar came to be cultivated among the Jews, there were some who attempted to explain either the whole of the O. T. or some of its parts, in the grammatical manner; of whom the principal were Aben Ezra, Jarchi, Maimonides, David Kimchi, and Isaac Abarbanel. On the criticism, also, of their sacred writings, some Jews bestowed no little labor. The study of some sort of criticism seems even to have existed among them previous to the 3d century of our era. It was confined, however, almost wholly to things of very trifling importance, agreeably to the turn of mind of their nation, and was employed about mere minutiae, such as the accurate computation of the number of words in each of the books of the sacred volume; nay, it was even partly conjoined with their cabbalistic pursuits, as certain astonishing mysteries were attempted to be discovered in the uncommon mode of writing some letters, or in an unusual manner of punctuation.

7. Some interpretations, or versions, as we call them, were made by the Jews; of which some were into Greek, for the use of those of their countrymen who could read Greek more easily than Hebrew, or who were quite ignorant of the Heb.; others were into Chaldee, intended for the use of those who had been accustomed to the Chaldee language, and with whom the language of their ancestors had fallen into disuse. Of these versions, some are full of allegorical and cabbalistical fables.

8. Our Savior quite disapproved of the perverted mode of interpretation adopted by the Jews of his time (Mat. 15:1-14); but, however, both He and his apostles, in quoting the sacred Scriptures, and using them for their own purposes, sometimes accommodated themselves to the received manner of the time; and Paul in particular, with a prudence deserving of much praise, occasionally adopted the allegorical mode.
